PREFACE TO THE SIXTH EDITION.

I have to apologise to users of this book for the delay in bringing out this edition. It has been brought up to date to the end of 1946. The rather long interval of seven years since the issue of the last edition has been marked by extensive addition to case law and changes in statutes ; and as a consequence, the book has undergone equally extensive changes.

I wish to acknowledge the help given to me by Mr. S. Rangachariar, B.A., B.L., and Mr. K. Annadhanam, B.A., both of Messrs. S. Vaidyanath Aiyar & Co., Registered Accountants, Delhi, in reading the manuscript before it was sent to the Press ; and in particular the help of the Madras Law Journal Press in getting the book through against formidable handicaps mostly beyond control.

'Marginal Notes'.—In Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Western India Life Insurance Co., Ltd., 1945 I.T.R. 405, reference was made to the fact that when the Legislature amended Section 42, it did not amend the marginal note which referred to 'Non-residents'. On the other hand, it would appear that the practice of legislatures is not to amend marginal notes, evidently in view of the fact that they are ignored in interpreting the relative sections.

Taxing Act—Construction of.—The Income-Tax Act being a fiscal measure, many of the provisions are of necessity arbitrary; the duty of the Court is to interpret the provisions of the Act, and if they are plain, to give effect to them, regardless of the consequences, and if there is ambiguity, to construe the provisions in favour of the subject, even if it results in his obtaining a double advantage.

After the above item, and before the item "Any other, etc.", the following has been added:

Scientific Research expenditure (if not charged in arriving at the figure of profit).

- (i) Any expenditure (not in the nature of capital expenditure) laid out or expended on scientific research related to the business. See note 17 (c). Give details.

For existing heads at the bottom the following have been substituted:

"Total income from property:

Less (i) claim for inconvertible rent (Give details separately).

In Note 17, sub-para. (c) has been relettered as (d), and the following new sub-paragraphs added:

(c) Under section 10 (2) (xii), (xiii) and (xiv) of the Act, revenue expenditure incurred by the assessee on scientific research related to a business or to the class of business carried on and sums paid to research associations or institutions will be allowed in the assessment of the profits of the year in which the expenses were incurred. Capital expenditure on scientific research will be allowed in five consecutive equal instalments and allowance will be given also in respect of such expenditure incurred not more than three years before the commencement of the business. Any expenditure on scientific research incurred in the previous year for the assessment year 1945-46 is admissible as a deduction in the assessment year 1946-47, but not in any subsequent year of assessment.

(d) Under section 10 (2) (vi) of the Act special initial depreciation will be admissible in respect of new buildings, plant and machinery. In the case of buildings the rate is 10 per cent. of the cost except in the case of buildings erected in the period 1st April, 1946 to 31st March, 1948 for which it is 15 per cent. In the case of plant and machinery, the rate is 20 per cent. The allowance will not be deducted in computing the written-down value.

Section 2 (1).—Payments out of Agricultural income.—The remuneration that a managing agent of a company receives under the usual type of agreement, viz., a commission at the rate of so much per cent on the annual net profits of the company after making the usual allowances but not depreciation or taxes on income, and provision for a minimum remuneration, is a share of profits, using the word 'profits', not in the ultimate sense of the profits divisible by the shareholders, but in a proximate sense of an ad hoc fund to regulate the payment for the managing agents' services; compare British Sugar Manufacturers, Ltd. v. Harris, 21 T.C. 528 (C.A.); (1938) 1 A.E.R. 149; 1939 I.T.R. 101. The managing agent does not step into the shoes of the company as in the case of a usufructuary mortgagee, see Commissioner of Income-Tax v. Sir Kameswar Singh, 1935 I.T.R. 305 (P.C.); nor is he a beneficiary under a trust as in Syed Mohamed v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1942 I.T.R. 267. The case is more akin to in re. Habibullah, 1943 I.T.R. 295; the payment does not depend on the income of the company, for the agent is entitled to a minimum remuneration even if the company makes a loss; the percentage is not necessarily payable out of agricultural income and the assets of the company are not vested in the agents. Therefore even though a part of the income of the Company may be agricultural, the whole of the managing agents' remuneration is non-agricultural.

Premier Construction Company v. Commissioner of Income-Tax, 1945 I.T.R. 391.

The case of the managing agent of a company with wholly agricultural income is still open.

Forests.—Income derived from trees which have grown wild is not agricultural income; and to describe it as such would involve a distortion of the meaning of the word "agriculture". *Yuvaraja of Pithapuram v. Rule 24.—This rule can apply only where the same person grows and manufactures the tea. Where a husband and wife, with separate tea estates (the wife's not being derived from the husband) had a common tea factory and there was no evidence to support a partnership between the two in respect of the tea estates, it was held that the benefit of Rule 24 could not be given to the tea factory. *Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Page 256.

Process ordinarily employed by cultivators, etc.—The process should not only be that employed by a cultivator, etc., but in order to render the produce fit to be taken to market. The produce must retain its original character in spite of the process unless there is no market for selling it in that state. If there is a market in its natural state and nevertheless the produce is subjected to processes that change its character, e.g., sugr cane into gur, the process is not agricultural within the meaning of the definition. Brihan Maharashtra Sugar Syndicate, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 611.

Executor's Business.—Where there was a clear mandate in a will to convert an existing business into cash as soon as possible, it was held that the mere collection of outstanding dues in a money-lending business without making any new loan, did not amount to the carrying on of a business. Estate of Lala Shankar Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1945 I.T.R. 500.

Page 304.

Section 2 (6) (b) Firm.—The existence of a partnership being a question of fact, the Court will not interfere unless the facts are inconsistent with the conclusions of the Commissioners. The onus of establishing the existence of a partnership rests on the partners, and if it is alleged that the partnership was oral, but the partners do not give evidence themselves, leaving it to their accountants to make certain submissions the Commissioners will be justified in holding that the onus has not been discharged. Taylor v. Chalklin, 1945 K.B.D.

Page 303.

Different partnerships.—There is a statement in the judgment of Beaumont, C. J., in Vissonji Sons & Co. v. C.I.T., Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 272 that 'in law a firm has no existence independently of its partners, and if there are two firms consisting exactly of the same partners, the real position in law is that there is only one firm. It may carry on a separate business and in different names but in fact there is only one firm in law.' In the particular case, it should be noted, the shares of the individual partners in the two firms were identical and the business of one of the firms was auxiliary to and almost a part of that of that other, and as the same Judge points out later, the only question before the Court was the limited one of whether there was evidence to justify the finding of fact by the Tribunal.

As to partnership being a question of fact, see also Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. K. B. Waliur Rahman, 1946 I.T.R. 287.

Page 297.

Section 2 (6-AA) Earned income.—There is no difference in this respect between residents and non-residents, but there is not much chance of a non-resident's having earned income except in the foreign incomes of firms, etc., controlled in British India in which the assessee works abroad, or of salaries or pensions paid from British Indian Funds.

Page 309.

Section 2 (9) and 14—Hindu undivided family.—The existence of a joint estate is not an essential requisite to constitute a Hindu undivided family and there may be such a family without owning any property. A Hindu coparcenary is a narrower body and includes only those who by birth acquire an interest in the coparcenary property. The jointness of a Hindu family without property consists in mess, residence, worship, etc. There is nothing therefore to prevent the existence of a Hindu undivided family composed of females only though there may be no coparcenary. It was held therefore that an allowance given by the Court of Wards to a widow of a proprietor of an estate under its administration and continued after the death of the only minor stepson was a payment out of the income of a Hindu undivided family. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Sarwan Kumar, 1945 I.T.R. 361 (All.).

Sections 3 and 41—Association.—Executors of a will in which the beneficial interests are clear and precise and take effect from the death of the testator, who moreover do not carry on any business, cannot be taxed jointly as an association of individuals. Estate of Lala Shankar Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1945 I.T.R. 500.

Page 339.

Mutual concerns.—The Calcutta High Court, with reference to Assam Agricultural Income-tax, was not prepared to follow the ruling of the Madras High Court in respect of the English and Scottish Joint Co-operative wholesale Society, 3 I.T.R. 385; it held that the Society was a trading concern and that its distribution of dividends was out of trading profit and not return of excess contributions. The case was more akin to Last & London Assurance Corporation, 10 App. Cas. 438 than to Style's case, 14 App. Cas. 381 and the concern was not mutual. England and Scotland Joint Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd. v. Commissioner of Agricultural Income-tax, Assam, 1945 I.T.R. 295.

Page 347.

It is not membership or non-membership (of the persons with whom a concern has transactions) that governs liability to or immunity from tax in such cases; it is the nature of the transactions that has to be examined. If they are mutual, the surplus (ex hypothesi, it is not profit) is not taxable; otherwise, the surplus is a profit and taxable. C.I.R. v. Ayrshire Employers Mutual Association Ltd. (H.L.).

Page 333 and 334.

Income of previous year.—Burma having been part of British India in 1936-37, income which accrued there in that year is assessable in the British Indian assessment of 1937-38 irrespective of remittance from Burma to India proper. The fact that both Burma and India taxed the profits in Burma for 1937-38 was immaterial because the two were different states then. E. M. V. Muthappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 311.

Excluded Areas.—A regulation made by a Provincial Government under Section 92 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1935, with the consent of the Governor-General, can be given effect to retrospectively if its intention to that effect is clear; and it is also not necessary for the preamble to the regulation to say in terms that it is for the peace and good government of the area. Where, therefore, in June 1942, a regulation provided that the Finance Act of 1939 should be deemed to have come into force in an excluded area on the 30th March, 1939, and an appeal which was pending before the Appellate Tribunal was disposed of only in 1943, it was held that the Tribunal was bound to apply the Finance Act of 1939 in considering the validity of the assessment. The regulation was not ultra vires and the Tribunal rightly held the assessment to be covered by the Finance Act of 1939. Raja Bahadur Kamakshya Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 693. See also Chatturam and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 695.

Free of tax.—Recent cases are

In re: Williams, 1945 Ch. D. (Uthwatt, J.).

Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Cook, 1945 H.L. (by majority of 3 to 2).

The question often to decide is whether the payee is to receive a gross sum with reference to the standard rate or to his own personal rate; and the answer ultimately depends on the words of the relative instruments governing the payment of annuity.

Page 378.

Annuities under will.—It is immaterial from what source a payment is made. What is relevant is the nature of the receipt to the recipient. Therefore, an annuity under a will is taxable even if paid out of capital funds. Jackson's Trustees v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, 25 Tax Cas. 13 (K.B.D.).

Page 401.

Cancelled contracts.—The payment received by a building company from the owner of land as consideration for not objecting to the withdrawing of land from the company's building schemes is a revenue receipt of the company, for the right of the company to build is a trading asset to it, i.e., floating capital of the company. Shadbolt v. Salmon Estate, 25 Tax. Cas. 52 (K.B.D.).

Similarly compensation for prevention of ribbon development is a revenue receipt in the hands of a land development company. Johnson v. Try, Ltd.

Payment for good will.—K. by his will provided that on his death his nephew M. was to carry on his business and give K's widow a two annas share in the net profits for twelve months and thereafter whatever M may think proper. There was litigation and under a compromise decree K's widow and M agreed that in lieu of paying a two annas share for one year and an indefinite amount afterwards, M would pay her Rs. 200 per mensem from K's death for so long as M carried on the business in the same premises, and the name. Held that the payments were in lieu of a share of income and not as instalments of the value of goodwill. Goodwill can no doubt be valued and paid for; if so, the payments would be capital, but on the facts of this case K desired that his wife should participate in the profits and the compromise gave effect to that desire. Commission of Income-tax, Sind v. Bai Nindhi Bai, 1946 I.T.R. 600.

Income from Forests.—Receipts from felling trees in a forest (not being an outright sale of the forest) are revenue receipts and not capital. Kamakshya Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 673.

Page 403.

Ploughing Grant from Government at so much per acre even if non-recurrent is income. Clyde Higgs v. Wrightson, (1944) 1 All.E.R. 488.

Lump sum contributions from Government for meeting cost of extending electric lines to unremunerative areas are capital receipts. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Poona Electric Company, 1946 I.T.R. 620.

Page 396.

Interest awarded by a Court in proceedings for recovery of debt or damages is ordinarily taxable irrespective of whether in the absence of the award any interest was due under any contract or arrangement. Regal (Hastings), Ltd. v. Gulliver and others, 1945 Tax. Rep. 205; Westminster Bank v. Riches (C.A.), 1945 Tax. Rep. 217.

Page 391.

Release from debt.—Where certain shares of a Company are forfeited for failure to pay the call up of capital and re-issued and the amounts already paid by the old shareholder are, under some other arrangement, credited to the old shareholders' account and set off against other debts due from him, the money so credited is neither a revenue nor a capital receipt of the Company, but part of its circulating Capital; the excess of the credit, if any, over the debt which may represent interest is taxable. In re Multan Elec. Supply Co., 1945 I.T.R. 457 (Lah.).

Prior Charges.—Allowances paid to widows in a Hindu undivided family under arbitration awards and forming an overriding charge on the income of the family before the other members can receive anything should be excluded from the income of the family; the allowances are not received by the widows as members of the family but under the awards. In re Hiralal, 1945 I.T.R. 512 following Lala Shankar Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1945 I.T.R. 500 and distinguishing Bhagwati v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. 1941 I.T.R. 31.

If a payment is voluntary, i.e., a payment out of the income of the payer it is part of the latter but if it is charged on the income it is the income of the payee and not part of the income of the payer.

Debt or income.—Whether what a person receives is a loan or income is not a matter of what the parties to the transaction choose to call it, but one of its true nature. An interest-free loan which is not repayable and is identical in amount with what would eventually be due to the payee and to which the payee is entitled from month to month was held by the High Court to be income, i.e., of the nature of an annuity but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who, however, gave leave for appeal to the House of Lords. Commissioner of Inland Revenue v. Wesleyan and General Assurance Society.

Basis of Assessment.—K, a Civil Engineer, who kept his accounts on a cash basis and by the calendar year, discontinued his profession as on 15th February, 1938 and the Income-tax Officer assessed him in 1939-40 on outstanding fees received by him during 1938 but after 15th February. The Income-tax Department did not apply Section 25 to the case. It was held (by Kania and Chagla, JJ., Stone, C.J. dissenting) that the assessment was in order. The dissenting judgment was based on the following reasoning. The proper approach is, not to assume that Sections 3 and 4 tax gross receipts and then allocate them under the heads in Section 6, for computation of allowances under Sections 7 to 12, so that the truncated total of gross receipts remains as the taxable balance, but to charge nothing to tax, until by the process of computation laid down by the Act, the status of income, profits and gains emerges. Therefore, what is taxable should first be capable of being so processed. The scheme of allowances under Section 10 and of set-off under Section 24 suggests that the business should be in existence when the receipts come in; and it cannot be argued that when the profession ended, it automatically gave rise to a new source, viz., 'other sources'. This view is also strengthened by the omission in 1939 of the previous reference to Section 6 in Section 4, and reference in the same section now to "computed in the manner laid down in this Act," instead of to "computed in the manner laid down in Section 16". Also in Section 3, the tax is leviable since 1939 not on "all income, etc." but on "income, etc.," which may be included in total income. The majority view, which is in accordance with In re. Beharilal Mullick, 54 Cal. 630, rests on the view that there is nothing in Section 10 to require that the business must be in existence at the time of receipt of the income.

Page 367.

Development Companies.—Income derived from a business of turning into account rights of winning and disposing of minerals is of a revenue nature and not of a capital nature, even though the receipts may take the form of shares in or terminable payments from companies taking over the rights or concessions. British South Africa Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Rhodesia, 1946 I.T.R. (Sup.) 17 (P.C.).

Royalties on minerals.—A payment received by an owner of coal bearing land from a miner-lessee, not as compensation for surrendering the lease, but as the estimated royalty on the abandoned coal, in accordance with the relative agreements, is not a capital receipt. Cossimbazar Raj Wards Estate v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1946 I.T.R. 377. In this case the real dispute was as to the construction of the documents.

Film rights.—What was received in return for the assignment of the film rights of a film for ten years (as distinguished from a mere licence) has been held to be capital; even in the case of a mere licence for ten years, if the licence allows the right to cut the film to pieces and combine its story with other stories, the right diminishes the value of the copyright of the film, and therefore the receipt is of a capital nature. Nethersole v. Withers (C.A.) (reversing, J., Macnaghten's judgment).

Salami.—It is not possible to lay down any hard and fast rule as to when Salami is taxable; it all depends on the facts of the case, on whether it is really rent paid in advance or a lump payment for transfer of the leasehold interest, and the only question of law is whether on the facts, the inference in law is right as to whether it is capital or income.

Where the Salami is received, not on account of rent, but for the settlement of certain disputes as to the validity of the lease, the Salami is a capital receipt, even though one of the considerations may relate to the extension of a prospecting lease for a period of 7 years. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar & Orissa v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, 1946 I.T.R. 738.

Debt or income.—Cesses paid by the Court of Wards in earlier years to Government on behalf of an assessee, which according to the assessee should have been paid by a lessee company, were reimbursed to the assessee in a later year as part of a settlement in which the assessee who had sought to repudiate the lease altogether on certain grounds agreed to validate them; it was held that the money received by the assessee on this account was not taxable, not being of the nature of income, and being reimbursement of expenses by which the assessee had been out of pocket through the Court of Wards. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar & Orissa v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, 1946 I.T.R. 738. It is not clear, however, on what basis the Court of Wards had been taxed in the earlier years, whether on the basis of gross royalties or net royalties after deducting cesses.

Page 408.

Section 4: Brought in.—The second proviso applies only to (b) (ii), i.e., income both accrued and brought in during the accounting year. Though, grammatically, the second proviso must apply to (b) (iii), there can be no case in which it can give relief. Therefore a person not ordinarily resident is taxable on income of preceding years (but after 1st April, 1933) brought into British India during the accounting year under assessment. Raghunath Madhavlal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1945 I.T.R. 376.

Page 441.

There is no presumption, either of fact or of law, that for income-tax purposes, a person carries all his money with him wherever he goes and that therefore he must be presumed to keep it where he resides, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. A head office and its branches, or branches inter se are not separate legal entities; and the mere invoicing of or adding on of so-called profits in respect of transactions between themselves cannot give rise to profit. If, therefore, a foreign branch buys goods and sends them to British India where they are sold, the profits arise in British India; it is not a case of profits being made abroad and then brought into British India, merely because the foreign branch debited the head office with not only the cost but a formal profit for which credit was given in the books of the foreign branch. The true profit can only be estimated by deducting from the sale proceeds the actual cost price paid outside plus all relative expenses at all stages up to the sale. It follows a fortiori that the Income-tax Officer cannot enhance the so-called (but non-existent) profit of the foreign branch and then assume that it had been brought into British India unless the assessee could prove that he had not brought in this (pro forma) profit to British India. Ram Lal Bechiram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 1 (All.).

Page 408.

Exemption of Rs. 4,500 of unremitted foreign income.—A resident cannot be deprived of the benefit of exemption of Rs. 4,500 under the third proviso to Section 4 (1), on the ground that the foreign income should be deemed under Section 42 to have accrued in British India and that it fell under Section 4 (1) (b) (1) and not clause (ii) thereof. The whole of the first part of Section 42 applies clearly to non-residents. Apart from the retention of the marginal note which still reads "Non-residents," making the whole of the first paragraph as one and connecting the two parts of that paragraph by 'and', the Legislature has clearly indicated that it was making provision for the assessment of a non-resident only by that paragraph. If the section was intended to apply to residents also, there would have been two separate parts of the Section, the first part covering the cases both of a resident and of a non-resident and the second dealing with machinery in the case of non-residents. Also the various expressions used in the first part of Section 42 are inappropriate on the case of a resident; for in the contingencies mentioned the income would accrue within British India. If Section 42 was intended to apply to residents also, its substantive part should have found a place more appropriately in Section 2 (definitions). Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Western India Life Insurance Co., 1945 I.T.R. 405.

Page 408.

If a registered firm has been allowed this rebate of Rs. 4,500 the partners cannot again claim this allowance in their own assessments in respect of their shares of the profits. Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind v. Valiram Bherumal, 1946 I.T.R. 407. In respect of his other income, if any, the partner could, it is submitted, claim the balance of the rebate, if any.

Inclusion in Income.—Though the sum of Rs. 4,500 is not taxable in British India, it is part of 'total world income'; Section 2 (15) and Section 17.

There is nothing in the section to justify the view that if income-exempted in an earlier year under this proviso is brought into British India in a later year, it is not liable to tax. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Rm. Ar. Ar. Rm. Arunachalam Chettiar, 1946 I.T.R. 760.

Deemed to accrue, etc.—Section 42 (3) applies only to profits deemed to accrue in British India; and not to cases of accrual or receipt in British India. Section 42 applies only to certain cases of income not accruing, etc., in British India but deemed by that section so to accrue and does not exclude the operation of Section 4 in respect of non-residents. Therefore, a non-resident who manufactures goods abroad but sells them in British India and receives the proceeds there is taxable on the whole of his profits and not merely on his merchanting profits in British India. Hira Mills, Ltd., Cawnpore v. Income-tax Officer, Cawnpore, 1946 I.T.R. 417.

Page 410.

Section 4 (2): Remittances from husband abroad to wife in British India.—Remittances received in British India by the wife of a ruler of an Indian State, who is himself immune from taxation, are liable to tax, even though the remittances are made by the state, if there is no dividing line between the public expenditure of the state and the private expenditure of the ruler. Rani Amrit Kunwar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 561 (All.).

Page 453.

Section 4 (3) (i) and (11): Charity.—The burden lies on the person seeking exemption to establish that his case falls under the exemption. 1946 I.T.R. 362 (Cal.).

Page 457.

An irrevocable trust need not necessarily be public; but a public temple is one intended for a large section of the public who are entitled to worship in it. A temple within a private building even if accompanied by poor feeding, etc., is not necessarily a public religious trust, and where a trust provides for such a temple and also a hospital, etc., only the portion of the income applied to the hospital is exempt. In re Charusila Dassi. 1946 I.T.R. 362 (Cal.).

Page 457.

Whether a religious trust is public or private should be determined by the deed of trust (if any) and other evidence, and if the deed is silent on this point, the question should be settled with reference to the relevant evidence, whether the benefits, worship, etc., are in fact open to the public. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Shri Dwarka Dheesh Temple, 1946 I.T.R. 440 (All.).

Page 457.

In order to secure exemption, the expenditure on public charitable purposes must be obligatory; it is not sufficient if it is permissive, e.g., where the trustee of a private religious trust is given power to spend, and spends, surplus funds on public charitable purposes, e.g., a school. In such a case, the whole of the income of the private trust would be taxable without excluding the expenditure on public charitable purposes. Sri Sri Jyotishwari Kalimata, etc. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar & Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 703 (Pat.).

Page 456.

Where the Karta of a Hindu undivided family carrying on business made an oral declaration of trust to set aside Rs. 2 lakhs for charities, and after an interval of about a year, created a liability for Rs. 2 lakhs in his account books in favour of a charitable trust, by transferring thereto credits already in his books (of the nature of profits reserved for expenditure on charities) and also the balance from the Profit & Loss A/C so as to make up Rs. 2 lakhs, it was held that the trust had failed because there was nothing to show that the settlor had separated the trust properties from his other property and deprived himself of the beneficial interest. Hanmant-ram Ramnath v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 716, following Chambers v. Chambers, I.L.R. 1944 Mad. 617 (P.C.).

The ratio decidendi was as follows:

"It was argued that when the Settlor and the trustees agreed that this sum in respect of which the Settlor created a trust was not necessarily to be retained by the trustees but was to be deposited with the (settlor) assessee's firm at interest. It was not necessary for the settlor physically to hand over Rs. 2 lakhs to the trustees and for the trustees to hand back the amount to the assessee in the capacity of a debtor. It is not necessary to continue this argument in the present case because this initial step of Rs. 2,00,000 being unavailable to the Settlor in cash is not established. In the absence of this fact being proved these entries must be considered as book entries."

There would seem to be no emphasis on the word 'cash' and if, for instance, the settlor in this case had set apart a part of his stock in trade or even book debts due to him from others in favour of the trustees, the trust would have been valid according to the above line of reasoning. In this case the books of the settlor could not have been balanced except on the assumption that there were assets against the profit and loss account and the two old charity accounts, and the Court's objection apparently was only to the non-specific nature of the assets. If the assessee had (say) borrowed from the Bank Rs. 2 lakhs temporarily and repaid it even the next day, after a formal payment to the trustees and deposit by them back with the settlor, the trust would probably have been held to be valid.

Section 4 (3) (vii): Casual Receipts.—'Non-recurring nature' means not that the payments have in fact not recurred but that they are not bound to recur. Rani Amrit Kunwar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 561 (All.).

Page 488.

Gifts.—In order to be taxable, income need not arise from a business, etc., or as the result of an outlay by the recipient or from an enforceable obligation, and may arise from voluntary payments. Occasional gifts however are not taxable; even if they recur, they are not ordinarily taxable. Rani Anrit Kunwar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 561 (All.).

Page 507.

Compensation for loss of employment.—An insurance broker with previous business connections was in the service of a company of insurance brokers for many years. His previous clients continued to remain his own and to them he devoted his whole time, but the commission in respect of that business went to the Company, who allowed him to retain 50 per cent. of it in addition to a fixed annual sum. The contract of service was oral. In 1937, his share of commission was £10,000. In that year, he was asked to give up his job to take up that of Managing Director and as compensation for the loss of his business and commission was paid £30,000. It was held that the sum was a capital receipt in his hands, for it had nothing to do with the office of Managing Director and was solely compensation for loss of his own business. Hose v. Warwick, 1946 K.B.

Page 500.

The decision in Smith Barry v. Cordy was reversed by the Court of Appeal and it was held that the dealings in the life insurance policies in question constituted 'trade'.

Page 515.

Section 4-A (b) : Residence of firm.—'Control and Management' should be 'de facto', and not merely 'de jure'. The words 'wholly situated' should be liberally interpreted; and the temporary visits of the active partners and the residence of the dormant ones should be ignored in arriving at a decision. Since control and management require the media of human minds, it would appear that when a plurality of persons jointly or severally control and manage a firm the analogy of a Company should be followed and just as in the case of a Company, it is seen among other things, where the registered office is located, it should be seen wherefrom the real control operates. The question is one of mixed fact and law. Bhimji R. Naik v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 334.

Page 543.

Section 7 : Employment.—Though a director as such is not a servant of the Company, there is nothing to prevent his being one by contractual relation to that effect; it is all a matter of evidence, whether there is such a relation or not. The fees of a Director are taxable under Section 12; while the salary of a servant is taxable under Section 7; and the rates of tax under the Finance Act appropriate to the two cases may differ when rates are changed from one year to another. Commissioner of Income tax, Bombay v. Armstrong Smith, 1946 I.T.R. 606.

See also Asher v. London Films, etc., 1945 I.T.R. (Sup.) 6 referred to under Section 12, and Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Lady Navajbhai R. J. Tata, 1947 I.T.R. 8.

Out of pocket expenses.—A student assistant in the research laboratory of a Company had under the conditions of his employment to take his B.Sc. degree, for which he attended evening classes. The Company subsidised his studies and did not reduce his remuneration for his hours of absence. He claimed to deduct from his salary the travelling expenses to attend the B.Sc. classes on the ground that his reading for the B.Sc. was an integral part of the duties of his office but the claim was disallowed; for, it could not be said that when listening to the B.Sc. lectures he was performing his duties as a student assistant of the Company's laboratory. Blackwell v. Mills, 1945 K.B.D.

Page 554.

Section 8, Provisos.—The whole of the interest on borrowed capital used in buying securities, whether tax-free or not, is deductible, and it is not open to the Revenue to apportion the interest between tax-free and taxable securities. Also, the whole of the interest receivable on tax-free securities should be excluded from taxable income, even though the assessee may thereby receive a seeming double advantage. C.P. & Berar Provincial Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 1946 I.T.R. 479, dissenting from Commissioner of Income-tax v. Madras Provincial Co-operative Bank, 1942 I.T.R. 490.

See also notes under Section 10 (2) (iii).

Section 9: Annual value.—The liability being on an artificially defined income, does not depend either on the power of the owner to let the property or his ability to receive the annual value, but solely on the ownership. Therefore, the fact that certain house property under trust is entitled to be occupied free of charge by certain beneficiaries will not absolve the trustees from liability to tax. D. M. Vakil v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 298.

Of which he is the Owner.—The legal position regarding the ownership of buildings constructed by a lessee upon land belonging to a lessor is different in India from that in England. In India, when a lessee erects a house on his lessor's land, during the period of a demise the house does not become appurtenant to the land but belongs to the lessee who can remove it or demolish it and take away the materials at the termination of the demise unless there is a stipulation to the contrary. A provision, therefore, that the lessors will take possession of the land and structures after the expiry of the full period of the lease does not confer ownership of the structures on the lessor until the expiry of the lease; in the meantime the lessees have the ownership of the structures and are therefore liable to tax under Section 9 of the Income-tax Act.

The Income-tax law does not distinguish between the ownership of 'property' by a Company and by an individual; and in either case the tax is to be computed under Section 9 and not Section 10. Ballygunge Bank, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1946 I.T.R. 408

Charge.—The liability of the land to be distrained or sold in the event of certain defaults will not in itself make a payment or the interest on a payment a charge on the land. Metro Theatre, Bombay, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1946 I.T.R. 638.

Page 583.

Section 10: Balance of profits.—In the case of a Company dealing in mineral rights and concessions and turning them to account, no profit can arise until a balance is struck between the cost of acquisition and the proceeds of sale, and the fact that the Company may retain some rights, e.g., possible reverter or shares in new companies, will not deprive it of the right to deduct the cost of acquisition when computing profits. But the Company cannot claim to postpone the emergence of profit until all its outlay has been recouped, though it may be convenient for the Income-tax authorities to agree to such a course. British South Africa Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Rhodesia, 1946 I.T.R. 17 (Supp.) (P.C.).

Section 10 (2) (iii).—Interest does not include discount or 'Contango' or 'backwardation'. Torrens v. C.I.R., 18 Tax Cases 262; these items would be integral parts of the buying or selling price and be subject to the same incidents.

Where a cinema concern pays in respect of leasehold land on which its theatre stands, a rent, including in it interest on outstanding premium, the interest is neither interest on capital borrowed for the borrower's business nor an expense admissible under Section 10 (2) (xv), not being spent for the purpose of the business. The mere purchase of a capital asset involving payment of interest on the outstanding balance of the cost from time to time does not amount to the borrowing of capital for the business. Metro Theatre v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 638.

Tax-free Securities.—As regards interest on capital borrowed and invested in tax-free securities, see also C. P. & Berar Provincial Co-operative Bank v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1946 I.T.R. 479 referred to under Section 8.

Section 10 (2) (vi): Depreciation.—There can be no question of any allowance for depreciation in the case of a Company which merely deals in mining rights; for such rights, being its stock in trade, have to be valued, like all such stock, on consistent and reasonable principles of valuation, involving adjustments, it may be, in either direction, not necessarily progressively downward as in the case of depreciation. British South Africa Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Rhodesia, 1946 I.T.R. 17 (Supp.) (P.C.).

Where there is a charge over in an electric supply and distribution system from Direct current to Alternating Current, and the distributor changes at his cost consumer's lines and fittings, it is open to the distributor to claim depreciation only in respect of his own plant and machinery and not in respect of the consumer's lines and fittings, for the latter do not belong to him. Poona Electric Co., etc., v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1946 I.T.R. 618.

Page 604.

Actual cost.—This has to be determined independently of whether any one other than the assessee contributed partly to the cost. Commissioner of Income-tax v. Poona Electric Co., etc., 1946 I.T.R. 620. The underlying idea is that the outside contribution, if any, is of the nature of a capital receipt and therefore to be kept out of the picture.

Page 618.

Taxes.—In Stewart and M'DDaid v. Clyde Trust (a recent case, see 'Taxation') the Scottish Court appears to have held that in awarding damages for loss of wages income-tax should be deducted from potential earnings, while the English Court in Jordon v. Limmer and Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co. (another recent case took a Company view. To a large extent, it would seem, the point depends on whether the damages when awarded will be taxable in the hands of the recipient.

Page 619.

Bonuses.—The "such sum" referred to in clause (x) of sub-section (2) of Section 10 is the same as the "any sum paid as bonus or commission" referred to earlier in the clause, and the reference is only to the quantum and not to the character of the payment. Therefore, if the other conditions of the clause are satisfied, the commission or bonus paid to a shareholder-employee in a private company cannot be disallowed, merely on the ground that a part of the money could have been paid to him as dividend otherwise, especially where the payment of bonus or commission has no relation to the share capital of the payee but only to his work as employee. Loyal Motor Service v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 647.

Page 623.

Bad debts.—In Bristow v. William Dickinson & Co., 1945 (K.B.D.) 6 Tax. Rep. 295, Macnaghten, J., reversed the decision of the General Commissioners and allowed the Crown to tax, as trading profits in the year of recovery, trading debts that had been written off as irrecoverable in an earlier year. The Court of Appeal—1946 I.T.R. 38 (Sup.)—confirmed this decision. The assessee's claim was that the item had been brought into account in the earlier year as a debt in respect of goods sold on credit, and that, therefore, the item could not be taxed again in a later year when received. The Court considered that, on the facts, the item could not be treated as having been finally brought to account in an earlier year. It was taken at full value in year 1, reduced in value in years 2 and 3, and recovered in year 4; it was therefore not like an ordinary trading debt at all, and it could not be held that it had been brought to account finally as a debt. The facts of the case were peculiar and related to sales in Spain under abnormal conditions. The general question, however, still remains unsettled as will be seen from the following remarks of the Master of the Rolls. "...if in year 1 there had been a debt which, for some reason, had been omitted, and then in year 4 the amount of the debt was paid, the proper course according to the ordinary practice would be not to treat that as a trading receipt of year 4, but as a trading receipt of year 1, when it ought to have appeared in the accounts in its then form of a debt....the proper remedy in that case, is to re-open, by proper procedure, the accounts of year 1. But that is not this case at all."

Scientific Research expenditure.—Under Note 17 to the form of Return of Income (Rule 19), as a special case such expenditure incurred in the previous year of the assessment year 1945-46 will be allowed in the next previous year.

Page 643.

Section 10 (2) (xv): Capital expenditure.—The consideration for the lease of forests containing harra nut & lac, though paid in instalments during the currency of the lease has been held to be capital expenditure. Appellate Tribunal v. Haji Sabu Miyan Haji Sirajuddin, 1946 I.T.R. 447 (Bom.). In such a case, what is acquired is not the raw materials but a source of raw materials.

In the case, however, of a Company dealing in mining rights, etc., the cost of acquiring such assets is not capital expenditure since it relates, not to the Company's fixed capital but to its circulating capital, which it turns over in order to secure profit from it. British South Africa Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Rhodesia, 1946 I.T.R. (Sup.) 17 (P.C.).

The House of Lords confirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Doncaster Amalgamated Collieries v. Bean.

Goodwill.—A share of net profits paid by a firm to an individual who is expressly declared not to be a partner and freed from liability for losses, for the use of a name the goodwill of which continues to belong to the individual is revenue expenditure of the firm, for it acquires no Capital asset thereby. The case is different from acquiring goodwill and paying for it in instalments, even if expressed as a share of profits.

Nor is such a case one of joint adventure (as in the Indian Radio and Cable Case, 1937 I.T.R. 270) nor one of sharing ultimate net profits as in the Pondicherry Case, 5 I.T.C. 353, but one of sharing ad hoc intermediate profits, as in the British Sugar Manufacturers' Case, 1937 I.T.R. 202; for a right and opportunity to do business rather than to earn the profits of the business; obviously, goodwill attracts customers and thus increases profits. Vithaldas Thakerdas & Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 822.

Section 10 (6): Trade Associations—Fees for specific services.—The fee levied by a stock-brokers' association to admit authorised clerks into the Exchange is remuneration definitely related to specific services rendered by the association for its members. The services were 'specific' because they provided an identifiable scheme laid down with sufficient clarity and it was immaterial that all members did not employ authorised clerks and, therefore, did not avail themselves of the services; Native Share and Stock Brokers' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T. R. 628.

Section 10 (7): Insurance business.—The main questions dealt with in General Family Pension Fund v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1946 I.T.R. 488, relate to the pre-1939 law and will not arise under the present law.

Page 710.

Rule 3 (a).—A Life Insurance Company pays income-tax and super-tax to discharge its own liability, and not that of its policy-holders; therefore, tax is not paid or reserved for or expended on behalf of policy-holders within the meaning of Rule 3 (a). The fact that a percentage of the life fund is reserved for policy-holders is immaterial. The part of the valuation surplus which is carried forward into the future valuation as at the credit of policy-holders is reserved for them and therefore deductible. New India Assurance Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T. R. 809.

Accountancy expenses.—While Allen v. Forquharson, 17 Tax Cases, 59 applies to income-tax and super-tax cases, legal and accountancy expenses on appeal (and a fortiori on the initial assessments) in the case of Excess Profits Tax, including appeals to Boards of Referees, can be deducted from taxable income; for until Excess Profits Tax has been correctly determined, assessment to income-tax cannot be made at will. Rushden Heel Co. v. Inland Revenue, 1946 (K.B.): 2 All.E.R. 141. The ground for deduction is even stronger in the case of appeals under the Excess Profits Tax Act against disallowance of remuneration of employees, for it may be necessary for the assessee to retain the services and goodwill of his employees. Smith's Potato, etc. v. Inland Revenue, 1946 (K.B.): 2 All. E.R. 284.

Section 12.—The expenditure incurred by a director of a bank in defending a suit seeking to invalidate his election is not capital expenditure. it does not create a new source of income but merely preserves an existing one; and it is incurred for the purpose of earning income as a director. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Sri Purushottomdas Thakurdas, 1946 I.T.R. 305.

As to whether a case falls under Section 7 or under Section 12, see also notes under Section 7.

Section 13: Basis of accounting.—Mere withdrawals by partners cannot be the basis of keeping accounts; and the fact that an assessee had been assessed in the past on the basis of actual withdrawals cannot make it a method of accounting regularly employed. In re Motichand and Devidas, 1946 I.T.R. 534 (Bom.)

Page 731.

The fact that it is not convenient or easy to allocate receipts or expenses as against various items of assets is no reason for holding that profits emerge only after the expenditure on the assets has first been recouped; the allocation of expenditure and income must somehow be made on a reasonable basis. But there is nothing to prevent the Crown from agreeing to the more convenient alternative of not taxing any profit until the expenditure on the assets has been completely recouped. British South Africa Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Rhodesia, 1946 I.T.R. (Supp.) 17 (P.C.).

Page 741.

Where a prospecting Company sells a concession to a public Company promoted by it and takes shares in the public Company in payment for the concession, the shares are the price for part of the prospecting Company's trading stock; and the shares should be valued on some reasonable basis, even if they cannot be sold in the usual manner through the Stock Exchange. If the new Company transfers the concession to a third Company receiving in exchange shares of the third Company which it distributes in specie to its shareholders, the first Company in fact realises part of its investments and the new shares should be valued in order to ascertain the profit or loss on the transaction. Gold Coast Selection Trust v. Inland Revenue, 1946 (C.A.).

Page 728.

The House of Lords confirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Craddock v. Zero Investments. The Revenue have no supervisory jurisdiction as to the reasonableness of contracts or transactions (apart of course, from the transactions being colourable or fictitious) and cannot, therefore, seek to displace the actual cost of purchase by alleged true market value to be ascertained otherwise.

Page 731.

Compensation, under a statute, for the prevention of 'ribbon' development can be said to be due only on the date of agreement if the compensation is settled by agreement or on the date of award if settled by arbitration or by a tribunal. Johnson v. Try, Ltd., 1946 (C.A.).

Page 771.

Section 15: Life insurance premia.—A life insurance policy will not cease to be such even though, under the terms, the assessee in any eventuality would have to pay more than he received. Babulal Kanji v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 662.

Page 770.

If, under the terms of the policy, the assured must take a loan (at interest) of a part of the premium, the policy becoming void in the event of his not taking a loan, the assured does not, within the meaning of Section 15, 'pay' the part of the premium represented by the loan, and he can get rebate of tax only in respect of the part of the premium not covered by the loan (ibid.).

Page 776.

Section 16 (1) (c).—In order to enable the trustor to claim a deduction from his own income, there should be actual transfer of income either to the beneficiaries or trustees or to others at their behest; and it is not merely sufficient that, of his own accord the trustor pays for the benefit of the beneficiaries and then claims that he has discharged his obligations to the trustees. The governing consideration is, not what the trustor could have done, but what in fact he did. Inland Revenue v. Compton, 1946 K.B.D.

Page 778.

For the third proviso to operate, it is not necessary that there should be a transfer of assets, it is enough if the income of assets remaining the property of the disponent has been transferred.

In the case of a settlement by a husband for the exclusive and independent maintenance of his wife, it cannot be said that the husband benefits indirectly (with reference to the third proviso), because he is under a legal obligation to maintain his wife. Shahapure, D.R. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 78.

Section 16 (3).—Income received by a wife from rent of property gifted to her by her husband before 1937 can be added on to the husband's income. Sheikh Mohammad Nagi v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1945 I.T.R. 452.

Section 22: General notice.—It is not open to an assessee who has filed a return of income in response to a specific notice under Section 22 (1) to object to the assessment on the ground that the general notice under Section 22 (1) had been issued irregularly, Kamakshya Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 672. Chatturam and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 695.

Section 23: Benami.—It is open to the income-tax authorities to find that a transaction was benami; but there should be materials for such a conclusion, and the onus rests on the authorities to show that the ostensible owner or beneficiary is not the true owner or beneficiary, the more especially in Muslim families where an individual holds property for himself and not for the family he represents. Sheikh Muhammad Nagi v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1945 I.T.R. 452.

Page 863.

Section 23-A: Onus of proof.—It is for the Company concerned to prove that the "public" are "substantially interested" in it within the meaning of the explanation to sub-section (2), if the Company wishes to escape from the operation of this section.

The question whether the shares of a Company were the subject of dealings in a Stock Exchange in British India during a given period is a question of fact; and the Court will interfere only if there are no materials for a finding. Huthee Singh & Sons v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 653.

Beneficial interests.—Section 23-A has no reference to equities or beneficial ownership, and where a husband and wife are jointly registered as the holder of certain shares, they have to be assessed as a shareholder with the status of an "association of persons". The section is a procedural one and not a charging section. It creates an artificial notional income which does not exist in the pocket of any shareholder. Provisions in the articles of association of companies to the effect that the first named among registered joint holders of shares shall exercise certain rights constitute mere administrative machinery for the purpose of the Companies Act, and have no bearing on section 23-A of the Income-tax Act. Cambatta v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 748.

Page 873.

Section 24: Identity of business.—This is a question of fact. The test for deciding whether two businesses are separate or not is the existence or otherwise of an interconnection, an interlacing, an interdependence between and a unity embracing the two. The mere fact of speculation by itself is not a necessary nexus between two or more separate speculative businesses integrating them into a single business of speculation; on the other hand, for a business to be single, speculation need not be of the same kind or in the same commodity every year. Govindram Brothers v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 764.

Page 879.

United Kingdom Law.—The United Kingdom Finance Act No. 2 of 1946 has liberalised the conditions of set off and carry forward of losses, e.g., by extending the period of carry forward for losses during war years, set off of losses against interest or dividends connected with trade, etc.

Page 992.

Section 41: Deities maintained under private religious trusts can be treated as juridical persons, and where the shares are precise and specific under the trusts, the deities should be charged separately to tax and not in lump at the maximum rate. Sri Jyotishwari Kalimata, etc. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1946 I.T.R. 703.

Page 988.

Section 40.—The payment received by a divorced wife from the husband for the maintenance of children of the dissolved marriage is income of the mother and taxable as such. Spencer v. Robson, 1946 K.B.D.

If such maintenance payments are given free of tax, the gross amount, for the purpose of taxation, should evidently be worked out on the basis of the ruling of the House of Lords in Inland Revenue v. Cook, 23 Tax. Cases 218; the Revenue authorities are not concerned with how a repaid sum is applied.

Page 1012.

Section 42: Business connection.—‘Freelance’ brokers in British India sent offers of purchase on their own contract forms or letterheads to a non-resident manufacturer, the brokers having no other connection with the non-resident, and the latter decided in each case whether to accept or reject the offer, the accepted form, bearing the stamp of the Indian state, being returned to British India for the signature of the purchaser. The contracts were all F.O.R. in the state, and the consignments were addressed to the non-resident to ‘self’ at the place of destination in British India, the railway receipts being sent to the purchaser either through the brokers or through banks and the purchaser receiving the railway receipt from the broker or banker on payment for the goods. It was held that there was no “business connection”. Ilira Mills v. Income-tax Officer, Coimbatore. 1946 I.T.R. 417. The expression ‘business connection’ does not admit of precise definition, but there should be some business in British India and the non-resident should have some connection with it, though there need not be a definite organisation, establishment or entity in the nature of an operating business, branch or agent. In the Ilira Mills case, the sales were to customers who merely happened to be in British India.

Page 1026.

Section 44-D.—This section does not cover the case of a transfer of assets to a Company resident in British India which subsequently becomes non-resident. The definition of ‘associated operations’ is confined to operations in assets representing the transferred assets or income therefrom, and cannot be extended to cover the case of subsequent change of residence by the transferee, Cf. Congreve v. Inland Revenue, 1946 K.B.D.

Page 1036.

Section 46.—A ‘legal proceeding’ is not necessarily a proceeding in an ordinary Court of law; and a proceeding under Section 46 (2) of the Income-tax Act is a ‘legal proceeding’ within the meaning of Section 171 of the Companies Act; and in accordance with the latter provision, an Income-tax Officer, before sending a certificate to the Collector under Section 46 (2) of the Income-tax Act in respect of tax due from a Company in liquidation should apply for leave of the winding-up Court. Governor-General in Council v. Shiromani Sugar Mills, 1946 I.T.R. 248 (F.C.).

Page 1038.

Priority.—All the previous rulings were reviewed by the Federal Court in the above case and it was held that except to the extent specifically provided in the Companies Act, particularly Sections 230 and 232, the Crown in India is not entitled to any priority, prerogative or preferential treatment in respect of debts due to it.

Page 1091.

Section 53. Composition of offences.—It is not necessary, in the case of most of the offences created by the Income-tax Act, that a formal assessment should have been made before prosecution can be started; it is, therefore, open to the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner to compound such offences at any stage of the proceedings relating to the assessment. The law in the United Kingdom also is similar. See for example, Cockerline v. Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 1.

Page 1094.

Section 54 (3) (m) —The expression 'appropriate authority' is wide and will include also a Civil Court when it is called upon to determine judicially whether a person has or has not been assessed to income-tax in a particular period, e.g., to decide in connection with alleged disqualification for relief under an Agriculturists Relief Act. Such a Court can call for the relevant information from the Income-tax Department. Venkata Seshavaram and others v. Chapalamadagu Venkata Rangayya and others. 1946 I.T.R. 722.

Page 1154.

Section 66.—The High Court is neither bound nor entitled whether at the instance of either party or of its own accord to propound a question of law not raised by either party before the Appellate Tribunal, either as an additional or as an alternative point of law to that referred by the Tribunal. The Courts' function is only advisory and confined to the points referred to it. Hira Mills v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 417 (All.). Nawab Nawazish Ali Khan v. Commissioner of Income-tax (Oudh). 1946 I.T.R. 356. Appellate Tribunal v. Radha Madur Trust, 1946 I.T.R. 472 (Nag.).

Page 1160.

It would be in conformity with Section 66 and also conduce to convenience if all the relevant facts were referred to in the statement of case instead of having to be sought for in the judgments of the Income-tax authorities. Hira Mills v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1946 I.T.R. 417 (All.); In re Badar Shoe Stores, 1946 I.T.R. 431 (All.) The High Court has no jurisdiction to go behind or to question statements of fact made by the Appellate Tribunal in stating a case; all that the Court can do is to return the case for further findings of fact, if the facts in the case are insufficient to enable the Court to decide the questions of law referred to it. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Dwarke Dhiesh Temple, 1946 I.T.R. 440 (All.)

This however, does not mean that the High Court is bound to accept findings of fact, even if there are no materials to support the findings.

When a statement of case is submitted to the High Court by the Tribunal, if either party desires further facts to be stated or other questions of law to be raised, it can make an application by way of motion and this would be heard along with the statement of case and it would be for the Court then to decide whether the statement is complete and also whether on the facts the Tribunal has raised the appropriate questions of law.

Khandavala & Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 635. Whether the requirements of a statute have been met by the facts is a question of law. The findings of fact themselves are questions of fact, except when there is no evidence for the findings, not merely insufficient evidence for them; and in the latter case the findings of fact also would raise a question of law. Brihan Maharashtra Syndicate v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 611.

Section 67.—While an Income-tax Officer has power under the Income-tax Act, not only to assess a person but to find for the purpose what property he has, and his conclusions, whether right or wrong, can be challenged only in accordance with the provisions of the Income-tax Act and not by a Civil Court and similarly the action of a Collector in realising the demand of income-tax as an arrear of land revenue cannot be questioned in a Civil suit, there is no jurisdiction in the Income-tax Act or the U.P. Revenue Act to bind third parties. Therefore, if the Income-tax Officer, finds some property to belong to an assessee which in truth belongs to a stranger, the latter has a cause of action against the Income-tax Officer. It should be noted however that there is conflict of authority as to the interpretation of the relevant parts of the U.P. Revenue Act. Secretary of State v. Radha Swami Sat Sang, 1945 I.T.R. 520 (All.).

Putting into operation the machinery of Section 46 in order to collect arrear of income-tax as arrear of land revenue is "an act done in the collection of revenue" within the meaning of Section 226 (2) of the Government of India Act. Also, the jurisdiction conferred by Sections 2 and 3 of the Indian Companies Act is "original jurisdiction" within the meaning of Section 226 (1) of the Government of India Act. Therefore, the High Court cannot restrain the Income-tax authorities from proceeding without leave of the Court to recover arrears of income-tax under Section 46 (2) of the Income-tax Act. Governor-General in Council v. Shriomani Sugar Mills, 1946 I.T.R. 248 (F.C.).

- (8) For the purposes of this section and of the rates of tax imposed thereby, the expression "total income" means total income as determined for the purposes of income-tax or super-tax, as the case may be, in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and the expression "earned income" has the meaning assigned to it in clause (6-AA) of section 2 of that Act.

7. To sub-section (2) of section 10 of the Indian Finance Act, 1942, the following proviso shall be added, namely:—

(iii) the additional super-tax shall be payable only by a company in which the public are substantially interested within the meaning of the Explanation to sub-section (1) of section 23-A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, or a subsidiary company of such a company where the whole of the share capital of such subsidiary company is held by the parent company or by the nominees thereof.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this paragraph,—

(a) the expression “capital of the company” shall be deemed to mean the paid-up share capital at the beginning of the previous year for the assessment for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1948 (other than capital entitled to a dividend at a fixed rate) plus any reserves other than depreciation reserves and reserves for bad or doubtful debts at the same date as diminished by the amount on deposit on the same date with the Central Government under section 10 of the Indian Finance Act, 1942, or section 2 of the Excess Profits Tax Ordinance, 1943;

(b) the expression “dividend” shall be deemed to include any distribution included in that expression as defined in clause (6-A) of section 2 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and any such distribution made during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1948 shall be deemed to have been made in respect of the whole or part of the previous year;

(c) where any portion of the profits and gains of a company is not included in its total income by reason of such portion being exempt from tax under any provision of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the capital of the company, the total amount of dividends, and the amount of dividends payable at a fixed rate shall each be deemed to be the proportion thereof that the total income of the company bears to its total profits and gains.

THE INCOME-TAX ACT.

THE BUSINESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1947.

Act No. XXI of 1947.

An Act to impose a special tax on a certain class of income.

WHEREAS it is expedient to impose a special tax on income arising from business;

It is hereby enacted as follows:—

Short title, extent and commencement.

1. (1) This Act may be called the Business Profits Tax Act, 1947.

(2) It extends to the whole of British India.

(3) It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, appoint.

Interpretation.

2. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(1) “abatement” means, in respect of any chargeable accounting period, a sum which bears to a sum equal to—

(a) in the case of a company, not being a company deemed for the purposes of section 9 to be a firm, six per cent., of the capital of the company on the first day of the said period computed in accordance with Schedule II, or one lakh of rupees, whichever is greater, or

(b) in the case of a firm having—

(i) not more than two working partners, one lakh of rupees, or

(ii) three working partners, one and a half lakhs of rupees, or

(iii) four or more working partners, two lakhs of rupees, or

(c) in the case of a Hindu undivided family two lakhs of rupees, or

(d) in any other case, one lakh of rupees,—the same proportion as the said period bears to the period of one year;

(2) “accounting period” in relation to any business means any period which is or has been determined as the previous year for that business for the purposes of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922;

(3) “business” includes any trade, commerce or manufacture, or any adventure in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture, or any profession or vocation the profits of which are chargeable according to the provisions of section 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922:

Provided that where the functions of a company or of a society incorporated by or under any enactment consist wholly or mainly in the holding of investments or other property, the holding of the investments or property shall be deemed for the purpose of this definition to be a business carried on by such company or society:

Provided further that all businesses to which this Act applies carried on by the same person shall be treated as one business for the purposes of this Act;

(4) "chargeable accounting period" means—

(a) any accounting period falling wholly within the term beginning on the first day of April, 1946, and ending on the thirty-first day of March, 1947;

(b) where any accounting period falls partly within and partly without the said term, such part of that accounting period as falls within the said term;

(5) "Company" means a company as defined in the Indian Companies Act, 1913, or formed in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or of Royal Charter or Letters Patent, or of an Act of the Legislature of a British possession or of a law of an Indian State, and includes any foreign association, whether incorporated or not, which the Central Board of Revenue may, by general or special order, declare to be a company for the purposes of this Act;

11. (1) The Income-tax Officer may, for the purposes of this Act, require any person whom he believes to be engaged in any business to which this Act applies, or to have been so engaged during any chargeable accounting period, or to be otherwise liable to pay business profits tax, to furnish within such period, not being less than forty-five days from the date of the service of the notice, as may be specified in the notice, a return in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner setting forth (along with such other particulars as may be provided for in the notice) with respect to any chargeable accounting period specified in the notice the profits of the business or the amount of deficiency, if any, available for relief under section 6:

(1) The Income-tax Officer, before proceeding to make an assessment (in this section referred to as the regular assessment) under section 12, may, at any time after the expiry of the period specified in the notice issued under sub-section (1) of section 11 as that within which the return therein referred to is to be furnished, and whether the return has or has not been furnished proceed to make in summary manner a provisional assessment of the taxable profits and the amount of business profits tax payable thereon.

(2) Before making such provisional assessment the Income-tax Officer shall give notice in the prescribed form to the person on whom assessment is to be made of his intention to do so, and shall with the notice forward a statement of the amount of the proposed assessment, and the said person shall be entitled to deliver to the Income-tax Officer at any time within fourteen days of receipt of the said notice a statement of his objections, if any, to the amount of the proposed assessment.

(3) On expiry of one month from the date of service of the notice referred to in sub-section (2), or earlier if the assessee agrees to the proposed assessment, the Income-tax Officer may, after taking into account the objections, if any, made under sub-section (2), make a provisional assessment, and shall furnish a copy of the order of assessment to the assessee:

Provided that assent to the amount of the assessment, or failure to make objection to it, shall in no way prejudice the assessee in relation to the regular assessment.

(4) In making any such provisional assessment the Income-tax Officer shall make allowance for any deficiencies of profits for previous chargeable accounting periods which are under the provisions of section 6 to be set off against the taxable profits of the chargeable accounting period in respect of which the assessment is being made:

Provided that, where such deficiencies of profits have not been determined under sub-section (1) of section 12, the income-tax Officer shall estimate the amount thereof to the best of his judgment.

(5) There shall be no right of appeal against a provisional assessment made under this section, and it shall, until a regular assessment is made in due course under section 12, determine the amount of business profits tax due from the assessee.

(6) If, when a regular assessment is made in due course under section 12, the amount of business profits tax payable thereunder is found to exceed that determined, as payable by the provisional assessment, it shall be reduced by the amount determined as payable by the provisional assessment.

(7) If, when a regular assessment is made in due course under section 12, the amount of business profits tax payable thereunder is found to be less than that determined as payable by the provisional assessment, any excess of tax paid as a result of the provisional assessment shall be refunded to the assessee, together with interest at two per cent., per annum calculated from the date of payment of such excess tax to the date of the order of refund, both days inclusive.

14. If, in consequence of definite information which has come into his possession, the Income-tax Officer discovers that profits of any chargeable accounting period chargeable to business profits tax have escaped assessment, or have been underassessed, or have been the subject of excessive relief, he may at any time within four years of the end of the chargeable accounting period in question serve on the person liable to such tax a notice containing all or any of the requirements which may be included in a notice under section 11, and may proceed to assess or reassess the amount of such profits liable to business profits tax, and the provisions of this Act shall, so far as may be, apply as if the notice were a notice issued under that section.

15. If the Income-tax Officer, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax or the Commissioner of Income-tax, in the course of any proceedings under this Act, is satisfied that any person has, without reasonable cause, failed to furnish the return required under sub-section (1) of section 11, or to produce or cause to be produced the accounts or documents or other evidence required by the Income-tax Officer under sub-section (2) of that section, or has concealed particulars of the profits of the business, or has deliberately furnished inaccurate particulars of such profits, he may direct that such person shall pay by way of penalty, in addition to the amount of any business profits tax payable, a sum not exceeding—

(a) where the person has failed to furnish the return required under sub-section (1) of section 11, the amount of the business profits tax payable;

(3) An appeal shall be in the prescribed form and shall be verified in the prescribed manner.

(4) The Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax shall hear and determine the appeal and, subject to the provisions of this Act, shall pass such orders as he thinks fit, and such orders may include an order enhancing the assessment or a penalty:

Provided that an order enhancing an assessment or penalty shall not be made unless the person affected thereby has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against such enhancement.

(5) The procedure to be adopted in the hearing and determination of appeals shall be in accordance with the rules made by the Central Board of Revenue in relation to income-tax.

rectify any mistake apparent from the record which has been brought to his notice by a person to whose business this Act applies:

Provided that no such rectification shall be made having the effect of enhancing the liability of any person unless that person has been given a reasonable opportunity of being heard.

Insertion of new section
12-B in Act XI of 1922.

6. After section 12-A of the said Act the following section shall be inserted, namely:—

‘12-B. (1) The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head “Capital gains” in respect of any profits or gains arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset effected after the 31st day of March,

1946; and such profits and gains shall be deemed to be income of the previous year in which the sale, exchange or transfer took place.

Provided that where the amount of capital gains in the previous year does not exceed fifteen thousand rupees, the tax shall not be payable by the assessee and such amount shall not be included in his total income:

Provided further that the tax shall not be payable by an assessee in respect of any profits or gains arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset, being property the income of which is chargeable under section 9 and which has been possessed by the assessee or a parent of his for not less than seven years before the date on which the sale, exchange or transfer took place; and the amount of such profits or gains shall not be included in his total income:

Provided further that any transfer of capital assets by reason of the compulsory acquisition thereof under any law for the time being in force relating to the compulsory acquisition of property for public purposes or any distribution of capital assets on the total or partial partition of a Hindu undivided family, or on the dissolution of a firm or other association of persons, or on the liquidation of a company, or under a deed of gift, bequest, will or transfer on irrevocable trust shall not, for the purposes of this section, be treated as sale, exchange or transfer of the capital assets:

Provided further that the transfer of a capital asset by a company to a subsidiary company, the whole of the share capital of which is held by the parent company or by the nominees thereof, shall not be treated as a sale, exchange or transfer within the meaning of this section where the subsidiary company is resident in British India and is registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, so however that for the purposes of clause (vi) or clause (vii) of sub-section (2) of section 10, the cost or the written down value, as the case may be, of the transferred capital asset shall be taken to be the same as it would have been if the parent company had continued to hold the capital as set for the purposes of its business.

(2) The amount of a capital gain shall be computed after making the following deductions from the full value of the consideration for which the sale, exchange or transfer of the capital asset is made, namely:—

- (i) expenditure incurred solely in connection with such sale, exchange or transfer;
- (ii) the actual cost to the assessee of the capital asset, including any expenditure of a capital nature incurred and borne by him in making any additions or alterations thereto, but excluding any expenditure in respect of which any allowance is admissible under any provision of sections 8, 9, 10 and 12:

Provided that where a person who acquires a capital asset from the assessee, whether by sale, exchange or transfer, is a person with whom the assessee is directly or indirectly connected, and the Income-tax Officer has reason to believe that the sale, exchange or transfer was effected with the object of avoidance or reduction of the liability of the assessee under this section, the full value of the consideration for which the sale, exchange or transfer is made shall, with the prior approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax, be taken to be the fair market value of the capital asset on the date on which the sale, exchange or transfer took place:

Provided further that where the capital asset is an asset in respect of which the assessee has obtained depreciation allowance in any year, the actual cost of the asset to the assessee shall be its written down value, as defined in section 10, increased or diminished, as the case may be by any adjustment made under clause (vii) of sub-section (2) of that section:

Provided further that where the capital asset became the property of the assessee before the 1st day of January, 1939, he may, on proof of the fair market value thereof on the said date to the satisfaction of the Income-tax Officer, substitute for the actual cost such fair market value which shall be deemed to be the actual cost to him of the asset, and which shall be reduced by the amount of depreciation, if any, allowed to the assessee after the said date and increased or diminished, as the case may be, by any adjustment made under clause (vii) of sub-section (2) of section 10:

Provided further that where the capital asset was on any previous occasion the subject of negotiations for its sale, exchange or transfer, any option or other money received and retained by the assessee in respect of such negotiations shall be deducted in computing the actual cost to him of such asset.

(3) Where any capital asset became the property of the assessee under any of the circumstances referred to in the third proviso to sub-section (1), its actual cost allowable to him for the purposes of this section shall be its actual cost to the previous owner thereof, and the provisions of sub-section (2) shall apply accordingly; and where the actual cost to the previous owner cannot be ascertained, the fair market value at the date on which the capital asset became the property of the previous owner shall be deemed to be the actual cost thereof.

(4) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), where a capital gain arises from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset which immediately before the date on which the sale, exchange or transfer took place was being used by the assessee for the purposes of his business, profession or vocation, or which in the two years immediately preceding that date was being used by him or a parent of his mainly for the purposes of his own or the parent's own residence, and the assessee has within a period of one year before or after that date purchased a new capital asset for the same purposes of his business, profession or vocation or, as the case may be, for the purposes of his own residence, then instead of the capital gain being charged to tax as income of the previous year in which the sale, exchange or transfer took place, it shall, if the assessee so elects in writing before the assessment is made be dealt with in accordance with the following provisions of this sub-section, that is to say;—

(a) if the amount of the capital gain is greater than the cost of the new asset,—

(i) the difference between the amount of the capital gain and the cost of the new asset shall be charged under this section as income of the previous year, and

(ii) for the purposes of computing in respect of the new asset any allowance under clause (vi) or clause (vii) of sub-section (2) of section 10 or the amount of any capital gain arising from its sale, exchange or transfer, the cost or the written down value, as the case may be, shall be nil, or

(b) if the amount of the capital gain is equal to or less than the cost of the new asset,—

(i) the capital gain shall not be charged under this section, and

(ii) for the purposes of computing in respect of the new asset any allowance under the said clause (vi) or any allowance or adjustment under the said clause (vii) or the amount of any capital gain arising from its sale, exchange or transfer the cost or the written down value, as the case may be, shall be reduced by the amount of the capital gain:

Provided that where in respect of the purchase of a new capital asset consisting of plant or machinery the assessee satisfies the Income-tax Officer that despite the exercise of due diligence it has not been possible to make the purchase within the period specified in this sub-section, the Income-tax Officer may, with the prior approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax, extend the said period to such date as he considers reasonable.

- (a) the amount which would have been payable if the amount of such inclusion had not exceeded that limit, plus;
- (b) one-half of the amount by which the amount of such inclusion exceeds that limit.

(7) Where the total income of a company includes any income chargeable under the head "Capital gains", the super-tax payable by the company in any year shall be reduced by an amount computed on that part of its total income which consists of such inclusion at the rate of super-tax (excluding the rate of additional super-tax, if any) specified in the case of a company by the annual Act of the Central Legislature fixing the rate or rates of tax for that year.'

(i) incurred during the period commencing on the 1st day of April 1946 and ending on the 31st day of December, 1947, in connection with that business,—

(a) expenditure on the removal of works constructed for protection against enemy attack;

(b) where under the orders of a competent authority the business was wholly or partly removed during the war, expenditure or again removing the business or part thereof;

(c) where any physical assets held for the purposes of the business were altered to adapt them to war conditions, expenditure on re-adapting them to normal requirements;

(d) expenditure in consequence of the termination of any contract for the supply of goods, materials or services, or the lease of buildings or machinery to him, where that contract is terminated by reason of the termination of a contract for the provision by him of goods, materials or services for the purposes of the war; or

(ii) incurred during the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1946 and ending on the 31st day of December, 1947, a loss on the sale of trading stock held on the 31st day of March, 1946, for the purposes of the business; or

(iii) incurred in any accounting period ending on or before the 31st day of March, 1946 in connection with that business any expenditure referred to in the sub-clauses of clause (i) which, except under the provisions of this sub-section, is not allowable, either wholly or partly, in computing the profits of such accounting period:—

the Central Board of Revenue may direct that such allowance as it thinks just shall be made in computing the profits of the business during the chargeable accounting period ending on the 31st day of March, 1946, and effect shall be given to such direction by repayment or otherwise, as the case may require:

Provided that in giving any such direction, the Central Board of Revenue may impose such conditions as it considers appropriate:

Provided further that where the applicant satisfies the Central Board of Revenue that it was not possible to complete any work referred to in sub-clauses (a), (b) and (c) of clause (i) within the period specified in that clause, the Central Board of Revenue may extend the said period to such date as it considers reasonable:

(2) Where an accounting period included, but did not end on, the 31st day of March, 1946, all expenditure referred to in the sub-clauses of clause (i) of sub-section (1) which would, apart from the provisions of this sub-section and rule 11 of Schedule I, be allowable as a deduction in computing the profits of the said accounting period, shall be treated for the purposes of sub-section (1) as if it were incurred after that day, and if an application is made under this section, no deduction from, or in computing, the profits of any accounting period or chargeable accounting period shall be allowed in respect of such expenditure otherwise than under sub-section (1).

(3) Where a change takes place in the persons carrying on a business, or a person carrying on a business, being a body corporate, becomes or ceases to be a subsidiary company or principal company within the meaning of sub-section (6) of section 9, and where except for the happening of that event relief would be allowable under this section, the Central Board of Revenue may, if it thinks fit, allow such relief under this section as it considers just, having regard to the extent to which the persons directly or indirectly interested in the business or body corporate, as the case may be, before the change remain interested therein after the change."

Amendment of Schedule I, Act XV of 1940.

18. To the first paragraph of rule 11 of Schedule I to the said Act the following proviso shall be added, namely:—

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

The main object of this Bill is to include in the Indian Income-Tax Act, 1922 provisions enabling income-tax to be levied on a profit or gain arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset. For this purpose several amendments to the Income-tax Act are necessary. In addition the Bill seeks to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act mainly by making provision for terminal losses occurring after the excess profits tax has ceased but which are properly attributable to the excess profits tax period. The main provisions of the Bill are explained in the Notes on Clauses below.

NEW DELHI,

LIAQUAT ALI KHAN.

The 27th February, 1947.

NOTES ON CLAUSES.

CHAPTER II.

Clause 2.—Sub-clause (a) defines “capital asset” as meaning any property (other than agricultural land) or any actionable claim in respect of such property held by an assessee, but it does not include such items as stock-in-trade which would properly be taken into account in determining his profits and gains chargeable under section 10 of the Act.

Sub-clause (b).—The effect of this amendment is to make accumulated capital profits now exempt taxable but not if they are capital gains of any previous year prior to the previous year for the assessment year 1947-48.

Sub-clause (c) enlarges the definition of ‘income’ so as to include capital gains chargeable under the new section 12-B.

Sub-clause (d) secures that in the case of a non-resident ‘capital gains’ arising outside British India are not included in his total world income.

Clauses 3 (a), 14 and 15—make only consequential changes to exempt capital gains in the case of Provident and Superannuation Funds which may consist inter alia of such gains.

Clause 3 (b)—is intended to withdraw exemption from tax in the case of a capital gain falling under section 12-B even though it may be of a casual or non-recurring nature.

Clause 4—amends section 4-A (c) so as to exclude capital gains for the purposes of determining the residence of a company on the basis of more than half the income arising in British India.

Clause 5—adds to section 6 another head of income, namely, “Capital gains”.

Clause 6—adds a new section 12-B to the Act. Under sub-clause (1) capital gains are deemed to be income and income of the previous year in which the sale, exchange or transfer takes place. According to the first proviso if the amount of capital gains in the previous year does not exceed five thousand rupees, it will be ignored and not included in the assessee’s total income. This will exclude assessment of small gains made in the disposal of personal effects or otherwise. The second proviso lays down that any distribution of assets on the partition of a Hindu undivided family, or on the dissolution of a firm or other association of persons or on the liquidation of a company or under a deed of gift, bequest, will or transfer on trust is not treated as sale, exchange or transfer.

Sub-clause (2) provides the method of computing the amount of a capital gain. From the full value of the consideration is to be deducted any expenditure incurred in the sale, exchange or transfer of the capital asset and its actual cost to the assessee including any capital expenditure incurred by him in making additions or alterations thereto. The cost is, however, to be reduced by any option or other money received in connection with any previous negotiation for sale, exchange or transfer. Where the capital asset is one in respect of which the assessee has obtained depreciation allowance, the cost is to be reduced to the written-down value of the asset subject to an increase or decrease to be made by the amount assessed or an allowance made under section 10 (2) (vii) of the Act.

In the case of assets acquired prior to the 1st January, 1939, as it is not sought to assess any appreciation occurring prior to that date, the assessee has been given the option to substitute for the cost the fair market value of the asset on that date.

Clause 7—amends section 14 (2) (c) so as to provide that the exemption conferred therein on profits arising in an Indian State does not apply to capital gains.

Clause 8—adds another sub-section to section 17 of the Act to secure that in the case of assets held by the assessee for more than two years, the tax payable on capital gains arising therefrom will not exceed the income-tax on such capital gains at the maximum rate.

Clause 9—amends section 18-A. "Capital gains" will not be taken into account for any of the purposes of this section.

Clause 10.—A loss sustained in the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset in any year will be set off against a capital gain made in that year. As in the case of profits, a loss which does not exceed five thousand rupees will be ignored.

Carry forward of such losses will be allowed for six years, but a set off will be permissible only against capital gains.

Clause 11—amends section 38 to enable the Income-tax Officer to require any dealer, broker, agent or any person concerned in the management of a commodity Exchange to furnish particulars of any payments or receipts connected with the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset.

Clause 12—amends section 42 so that gains arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset in British India will be deemed to be income accruing or arising in British India.

Clause 13—amends section 43 so that a person to whom a non-resident sells his assets in British India can be treated as his agent. If he is treated as agent, he will be liable to pay the tax on the capital gains made by the non-resident principal and the tax can be recovered from the agent's assets in British India including the assets sold or transferred to him by the non-resident principal.

CHAPTER III.

Clause 16.—It is well known that during the period of the war many persons, not previously carrying on business or carrying on business on only a small scale, have made very considerable profits. The responsibilities laid upon Income-tax Officers who have to function also as Excess Profits Tax Officers have been so heavy that it has been practically impossible for them to discover every such case. The clause seeks to extend the period during which action may be taken by Excess Profits Tax Officers to secure for the Revenue its just dues in such cases.

Clause 17.—This clause seeks to implement the promise given to provide for allowance, against the profits of the final E.P.T. chargeable accounting period, of losses and expenditure arising in the period of transition from war-time to peace-time conditions.

Clause 18.—Rule 11 of the First Schedule to the Act may be interpreted as giving the power to relate back to Excess Profits Tax chargeable accounting periods expenditure incurred after the termination of the tax. This clause seeks to limit the period the expenditure during which may be so related back.

TAXATION ON INCOME (INVESTIGATION COMMISSION) ACT 1947.

An Act to provide for an investigation into matters relating to taxation on income.

No act or proceeding of the Commission or any person authorised by it under sub-section (2) of section 6 shall be called in question in any manner by any Court, and no suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against the Crown or any Commissioner or any other person for anything in good faith done or intended to be done under this Act.

10. The Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, make rules for carrying out the purposes of this Act.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

It is notorious that recently businesses and properties have changed hands for very large sums of money. Government are anxious to know how in spite of very high rates of taxation—income-tax, super-tax and Excess Profits-Tax—the large fortunes which these transactions imply have been accumulated. The Bill therefore proposes to appoint and empower a special Commission to investigate both the actual incidence of taxation with particular reference to individual cases and the extent to which the existing law is adequate to prevent evasion. The main provisions of the Bill are explained in the notes on clauses below.

NOTES ON CLAUSES.

Clause 3.—The contemplated functions of the Commission are two-fold, to make a general report on the effectiveness or otherwise of the existing law and procedure to prevent tax evasion, and to make special investigations into particular cases. In these cases it is necessary for the success of the investigation that the Commission should have power to investigate the financial affairs of other connected persons.

Clause 5.—This is a normal provision when ad hoc tribunals such as this Commission are set up. It vests the Commission with powers of a Civil Court to compel the production of evidence, both oral and documentary, before it, and gives it the same powers as a Court possesses in regard to offences committed before it.

Clause 6.—It will not be possible for the Commission itself to make all the detailed investigation that will be required, and this clause enables the Commission to appoint expert accountants or assessment officers to aid the Commission in its task. Such persons must be vested with like powers to compel the production of evidence before them.

Clause 7.—Sub-clause (1) gives the Commission general power to regulate its own procedure, and the final sub-clause is a normal provision, giving the Commission and its investigating staff the status of public servants. Contempts of their authority are thus brought within the mischief of Chapter X of the Indian Penal Code. The intervening sub-clauses in effect relax the ordinary law of evidence in proceedings before the Commission and investigating officers: these special provisions are regarded as essential to the success of the Commission's investigations. A witness who duly answers questions put to him will be entitled to a certificate of indemnity protecting him from liability in civil or criminal courts in respect of statements made by him in proceedings under this Bill, though an exception may be made against a person whose affairs are being investigated if the Commission holds the opinion that it would be against the public interest to grant such an indemnity.

Clause 8.—Should it be found in any case that there has been evasion of tax, Government is given power by this clause to order reassessment, proceedings for which may be taken up notwithstanding any bar against the reopening of assessment proceedings in the relevant law. And any facts elicited by the Commission may be used in proceedings under this clause.

Clause 9.—This is the usual indemnity provision.

INTRODUCTION.

INCOME AND CAPITAL.

Income-tax, as its name implies, is a tax on Income. But, what is Income? The law does not define it, though it sets out certain provisions as to particular kinds of receipts that should be excluded or included and as to the methods of computing income. See sections 2 (6-C) and 8 to 12 of the Indian Income-tax Act. As to the nature of income, we have to seek guidance from judicial pronouncements which again are based largely on commercial usage. Commercial usage, unfortunately, is not altogether a reliable guide; and in practice there is no more baffling problem that faces a Commercial Accountant than the allocation of items as between Capital and Revenue. The concepts of Capital and Income have been the subject of close analysis by successive generations of economic thinkers; and, as the following extracts from the classic book of Professor Fisher's¹ will show, the concepts have been elusive and have defied analysis.

"Capital is a fund and income a flow.....Capital is wealth, and income is the service of wealth.....A stock of wealth existing at an instant of time is called Capital. A flow of services through a period of time is called income.....From the time of Adam Smith it has been asserted by economists, though not usually by businessmen, that only particular kinds of wealth could be capital, and the burning question has been, what kinds? But the failure to agree on any dividing line between wealth which is and wealth which is not capital, after a century and a half of discussion, certainly suggests the suspicion that no such line exists. What Senior wrote seven decades ago is true to-day; "Capital has been so variously defined, that it may be doubtful whether it has any generally received meaning." In consequence, "almost every year there appears some new attempt to settle the disputed conception, but, unfortunately, no authoritative result has as yet followed these attempts. On the contrary, many of them only served to put more combatants in the field and furnish more matter to the dispute." Many authors express dissatisfaction with their own treatment of capital, and even recast it in successive editions.

Adam Smith's concept of capital is wealth which yields "revenue." He would therefore exclude a dwelling occupied by the owner. Hermann, on the other hand, includes dwellings, on the ground that they are durable goods. But a fruiterer's stock in trade, which is capital according to Smith, because used for profit, according to Hermann does not seem to be capital, because it is perishable. Knies calls capital any wealth, whether durable or not, so long as it is reserved for future use. Walras attempts to settle the question of durability or futurity by counting the uses. Any wealth which serves more than one use is capital. A can of preserved fruits is therefore capital to

(1) "The Nature of Capital and Income" by Professor Irving Fisher—MacMillan & Co. A study of this book is strongly recommended.

Knies, if stored away for the future; but is not capital to Walras, because it will perish by a single use. To Kleinwachter, capital consists only of "tools" of production, such as railways. He excludes food, for instance, as passive. Jevons, on the contrary, makes food the most typical capital of all, and excludes railways except as representing the food and sustenance of the labourers who built them.

While most authors make the distinction between capital and non-capital depend on the kind of wealth, objectively considered, Mill makes it depend on the intention in the mind of the capitalist as to how he shall use his wealth. Marx makes it depend on the effect of the wealth on the labourer, and Tuttle, upon the amount of wealth possessed. Again, while most authors confine the concept of capital to material goods, MacLeod extends it to all immaterial goods which produce profit, including workmen's labour, credit, and what he styles, "incorporeal estates," such as the Law, the Church, Literature, Art, Education, an author's Mind. Clark takes what he styles "pure" capital out of the material realm entirely, making it consist, not of things, but of their utility. Most authors leave no place, in their concept of capital, for the value of goods as distinct from the concrete goods themselves, whereas Fetter, in his definition, leaves place for nothing else. Some definitions are framed with especial reference to particular problems of capital; many, for instance, have reference to the problem of capital and labour, but they fail to agree as to the relation of capital to that problem. MacCulloch regards it as a means of supporting labourers by a wage fund; Marx as a means of humiliating and exploiting them; Ricardo, as a labour saver; MacLeod, as including labour itself as a special form of capital.

Many definitions have reference to the problem of production, but in no less discordant ways. According to Senior, Mill and many others, capital must be itself a product. Walras, MacLeod and others admit land and all natural agents under capital. Bohm-Bawerk, while agreeing that it must be a product, insists that it must not apply to a finished product. Marx denies that capital is productive. Bohm-Bawerk admits that it is not "independently" productive, but denies the Marxian corollary that it should not receive interest. Other writers make it co-ordinate with land and labour as a productive element.

As to what it is that capital produces, there is further disagreement. Adam Smith affirms that capital produces "revenue," Senior, that it produces "wealth." Others vaguely imply that it produces value, services, or utility.

Most of the definitions involve some reference to time, but in many different ways. Hermann has in mind the time the wealth will last; Clark, the permanency of the fund capital as contrasted with the transitoriness of its elements, "capital goods"; Knies, the futurity of satisfactions; Jevons and Landry, specifically the time between the "investment" of the capital and its return.

It is idle to attempt any reconciliation between concepts of capital so conflicting, and yet there are elements of truth in all. Though generally wrongly and narrowly interpreted, there are certain recurrent ideas which are entirely correct. The definitions concur in striving to express the important facts that capital is productive, that is, is antithetical to income, that it is a provision for the future, or that it is a reserve. But they assume that only a part of all wealth can conform to these conditions. To the authors of the definitions quoted, it would seem absurd to include all wealth as capital, as there would be nothing left with which to contrast it and by which to define it. And yet, as Professor Marshall says, when one attempts to draw a hard-and-fast line between wealth which is capital and wealth which is not capital, he finds himself "on an inclined plane," constantly tending, by being more liberal in his interpretation of terms, to include more and more in the term capital, until there is little or nothing left outside of it. We are told, for instance, that capital is wealth for future use. But "future" is an elastic term. As was shown in Chapter II, all wealth is, strictly speaking, for future use. It is impossible to push back its use into the past, neither is it possible to confine it to the present. The present is but an instant of time, and all use of wealth requires some duration of time. A plateful of food, however hurriedly it is being eaten, is still for future use, though the future is but the next few seconds; and if by "future" we mean to exclude the "immediate future," where is the line to be drawn? Are we to say, for instance, that capital is that wealth whose use extends beyond seventeen days?

And as all wealth is for future use it is also, by the same token, all a "reserve." To call capital a reserve does not, therefore, in strictness, delimit it from other wealth. Even a beggar's crust in his pocket will tide him over a few hours.

Equally futile is any attempt definitely to mark off capital as that wealth which is "productive." We have seen that all wealth is productive in the sense that it yields services. There was a time when the question was hotly debated what labour was productive and what unproductive. The distinction was barren and came to be so recognized. No one now objects to calling all labour productive. And if this productivity is common to all labour, it is equally common to all wealth. If we admit that a private coachman is a productive worker, how can we deny that the horse and carriage are also productive, especially as the three merely co-operate in rendering the very same service, transportation?

Finally, we cannot distinguish capital as that wealth which bears income. All wealth bears income, for income consists simply of the services of wealth. But the idea, that some wealth bears income and some not, has been persistent from the time of Adam Smith, who meaning by income only money income, conceived capital as the wealth, which produces income in this sense, as distinguished from the wealth such as dwellings, equipages, clothing, and food, which dissipates that income. A home, according to him, is not a source of income, but of expense, and therefore cannot be capital.

In these and other ways have economists introduced, in place of the fundamental distinctions between fund and flow, and between wealth and services, the merely relative distinction between one kind of wealth and another. As a consequence, their studies of the problems of capital have been full of confusion. Among the many confusions which have come from overlooking the time distinction between a stock and a flow was the famous "wage fund" theory, that the rate of wages varies inversely with the amount of capital in the supposed "wage fund".

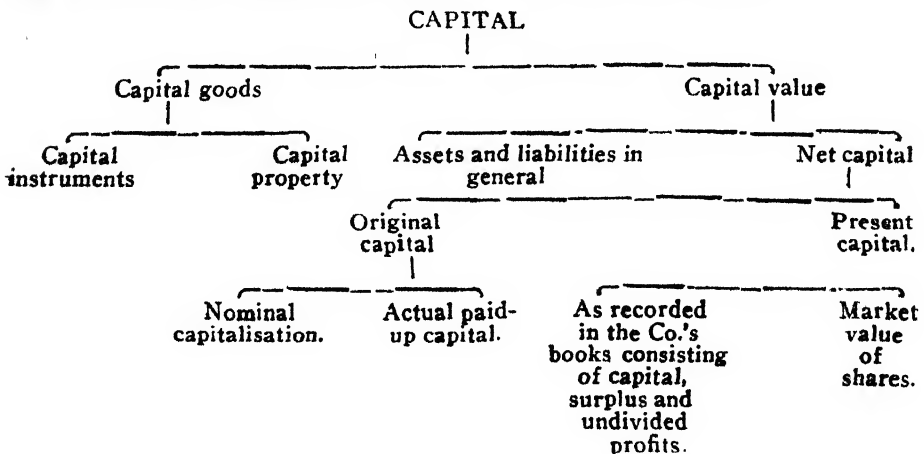

A little attention to business book-keeping would have saved economists from such errors; for the keeping of records in business involves a practical, if unconscious, recognition of the time principle here propounded. The "capital account" of a railway, for instance, gives the condition of the railway at a particular instant of time, and the "income account" gives its operation through a period of time.

As to popular and business usage, it may be said that a careful study of this usage as reflected by lexicographers, who have sought from time to time to record it, reveals the fact that before the time of Adam Smith capital was not regarded as a part of the stock of wealth, but as synonymous with that stock. . . .

In business manuals and articles on practical accounting we find that capital is employed in the sense of the net value of a man's wealth.

As one business-man expressed it, "Capital is simply a book-keeping term." Consequently the business-man naturally associates the term with his shop and not his home, for he keeps a balance sheet in the former and not in the latter; but, once given a balance sheet, it does not matter what purpose is behind it. A social club, an art gallery, or a hospital may have a capital. In one year a joint stock company with capital stock was proposed for the purpose of building the yacht for defending the American Cup. If a private family should call itself a joint stock company and draw up a balance sheet, entering all its property, house, furniture, provisions, etc., on one side, with the debts on the other, no business-man, we imagine, would hesitate to call the balance of assets over liabilities, which is the total wealth-value of the family, by the name "capital." As a business-man said to the writer, "Capital is not a part of wealth, but all a man has got, including his automobile." "Is that cigar in your mouth capital?" he was asked. "No," he said, hesitatingly; but this opinion he quickly reversed as inconsistent with his former statement, and admitted that a box of cigars and each cigar in it, or out of it, for that matter, were a part of his stock or reserve. . . .

We see, then, that the 'capital' of a person or firm has four separate meanings—the nominal 'capitalisation'; the actual original 'paid-in-capital'; the present accumulated capital or 'capital, surplus and undivided profits' as given by the book-keeper; and the market estimate of the same, i.e., the value of the shares. These and the other senses of capital are given in the following scheme which displays the various uses of the term 'capital.'

. . . . Were it not for an instinctive feeling that there exists a definite 'income' concept the repeated failure to formulate it might lead one to conclude that it is not susceptible of any exact and rigorous definition and that the best course is to abandon its search as futile. . . .

Income (or outgo) always implies (1) capital as the source, and (2) an owner of capital as the beneficiary. . . . It will be observed that the cost of reconstructing the house was entered in the accounts in exactly the same way as repairs or other 'current' costs. There may seem to be objection to such a proceeding in the thought that reconstruction appears to be not a part of 'running expense' but a 'capital' cost and belongs not to income accounts but to capital accounts. It is true that the value of the new house must be entered on the capital balance sheet but the cost of producing it belongs properly to income accounts. The former represents wealth, the latter represents disservices. The former relates to an instant of time (which may be any instant from the time it is begun till the time when it ceases to exist), the latter relates to a period of time (which may be all or any part of the time during which the labour and other sacrifices occasioned by the house occur). A house is quite distinct from the series of sacrifices by which it was fashioned. And yet it is undoubtedly true that we instinctively object to entering the cost of building the house in its income and outgo account; and we express the objection by calling this last a 'capital' cost rather than a part of running expenses. By so classing it we mean that it does not recur or at any rate only at long intervals. . . .

And this procedure (of taxing 'realised' income) is very common in practice. It amounts to taxing not the income actually flowing from capital but its 'earnings' or the interest upon the capital. It is familiar in the 'general property tax' in the United States. . . . To some extent also the British income-tax is an instance of the same fallacy. . . . The general principle connecting 'realised' and 'earned' income is that they differ by the appreciation or depreciation of capital."

However logical some of these theories and distinctions might be, and Professor Fisher's own theory is undoubtedly logical, they do not easily solve the practical difficulty of distinguishing whether particular items in a concrete case constitute 'Capital' or 'Income'. Judicial decisions, on the other hand, have had to solve this problem and necessarily rest on a less logical footing. Business usage and company law, the nature of the business, distinctions between 'fixed' and 'circulating' capital, the motives of persons, the degree of control a person has over the receipt, and similar considerations have been taken into account by the law courts, as will be seen from the decisions set out in the body of the book. The position is very obscure and it is almost impossible satisfactorily to lay down any general principles as to what constitutes the distinction between Capital and Income and the extent to which the question is one of law or one of fact.

The various rulings on the subject are set out under section 2 (4)—Business, section 2 (6-C)—Income, section 3—Income and Capital, section 4 (3) (vii)—Casual profits, and section 10 (2) (xii)—Capital expenditure.

HISTORY OF INCOME-TAX LAW IN INDIA.

It would be scarcely relevant to the purpose of this book to detail the history of direct taxation in India in pre-British days. It hardly seems necessary therefore to refer to Manu or to Santi Parva or to Kautilya; nor even to less distant periods like those of Akbar or Sher Shah.

"Direct taxation is not a novelty in India introduced by the British, as too commonly supposed, but a most ancient and well-known institution. Indian Governments have, from time immemorial, made the non-agricultural classes contribute their share of the expenses of the State. To the Indian mind in general, this appeared only just, fitting, and to be contentedly borne. Between cultivators and traders, poor and rich, no sense of unequal treatment could subsist under the system which the predecessors of the British in the Empire for centuries pursued. But when the British superseded them, they gradually abolished the structure of direct taxation which their predecessors had laboriously raised. In the elder Provinces, that is, those that came under British rule first, this change was consummated by about the year 1844; in the newer ones it took place later, but the only survivals of the Indian system now are the 'Capital' tax and the 'Thathameda' in Burma. The last of them to be abolished was the 'Pandhari' tax in the Central Provinces. (The 'Capital' tax and the 'Thethameda' have also been abolished, since). Where Indian States continued the taxation, they retained their old method of direct taxation till recently, when the force of circumstances has compelled them to copy British methods.

The British Government which had gradually abandoned direct taxation was obliged by financial necessities to revert to direct taxation in 1860. But instead of an indigenous model, softened and adapted to local circumstances, the Government unfortunately set up that of the income-tax, as in force in England. To get direct taxation into good working order, even after a suitable model, would have been a work of time and care, in the absence of the long-standing record of the names and resources of house-holders which had been done away with in earlier days. But what, except failure, could attend a sudden call on relatively ignorant and unlettered millions, at short notice, to assess themselves, or prove right of exemption, to send in elaborate returns and calculations, and to understand and watch their own interests under the system of notices, surcharges, claims, abatements, instalments, penalties and what not, consequent thereon? Necessarily, there followed a long train of evils. An army of tax assessors and collectors temporarily engaged could not be pure. They were aided by an army of informers, actuated by direct gain or private animosity. Frauds in assessment and collection went hand in hand with extortion in return for real or supposed exemption. Inquisition into private affairs, fabrication of false accounts where true ones did not exist or were inconvenient, acceptance of false returns, rejection of honest ones, unequal treatment of the similarly circumstanced, all these more or less prevailed. The tax reached numbers not really liable, for zamindars illegally recovered it from tenants and masters from servants, while underlings enriched themselves by the threat of a summons. Acts XXI of 1861 and XVI of 1862 while affording relief in some respects, practically stereotyped many inequalities and heart-burnings. In later years, the system of assessment by broad classes was an improvement on the earlier complications; but the advance of local officers towards equitable assessment was perpetually being cancelled by the alterations in rate and liability.

Renewed direct taxation in British India thus made a false start, from which it did not easily recover. Possibly, with time and care, a great improvement might have been effected, if the law had remained unaltered. But, unluckily, with its too English form, came the idea that the tax was to be, as in England, a convenient means of rectifying Budget inequalities, and a great reserve in every financial or national emergency. In consequence of this idea, incomes between Rs. 200 and 500, which had been taxed at 2 per cent. in 1860, were exempted in 1862, the 4 per cent. rate was reduced to 3 per cent. in 1863, and the whole tax was dropped in 1865. In 1867 it re-appeared in the modified form of a licence-tax, at the rate of only 2 per cent. at most, but reaching down again to incomes of Rs. 200. In 1868 it became a certificate-tax, at rates a fifth lower, and again commencing with a Rs. 500 limit. In 1869 it became once more a full-blown income-tax at 1 per cent. on all incomes and profits of Rs. 500 and upwards. In the middle of the same year it was suddenly nearly doubled. In 1870 a further rise to fully 3 $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. occurred; but with better times, the rate fell in 1871 to 1 $\frac{1}{24}$ per cent., with a limit of Rs. 750 and in 1872 the limit was further relaxed to Rs. 1,000 and upwards. In 1873 came a second period of total abolition, to be succeeded from 1877-78 by a new series of Acts. Along with the changes in rate and incidence just described, came changes in name, form, classification and procedure. With one object or another, twenty-three Acts on the subject were passed between 1860 and 1886.

Owing to the perpetual changes, the people, never certain who was liable or what was the sum due, were an easy prey for fraud and extortion, while the superior officials, time after time, found their labours thrown away, and a fresh battle with guesswork and deception to be begun. That both officials and people should in 1872 have united to condemn an impost hitherto associated only with such evils, is not to be wondered at. Our abandonment of the machinery of direct taxation inherited from our predecessors was one of the things in us which the mass of the people disliked without being able to understand. Our new-fangled and European attempts to retrace this policy seemed to them tyrannical, compared with the rude expedients familiar to their fathers. All things considered, the abolition of the income-tax in 1873 was probably the best thing that could then be done.

But direct taxation could not long be dispensed with. A new start was made in 1877. This start was, I think, decidedly well intentioned, made in considerable appreciation of past defects and desire to avoid them. It was wise to begin with trades and classifications, but it seems to me that too much was made of supposed local differences, and too much importance attached to local action. Bengal, Madras and Bombay passed Acts of their own; Northern India was dealt with by the Imperial legislature. As a necessary consequence, further legislation was soon needed to remedy inequalities. Some good was thereby effected; more would have resulted, but for the, as I think, unfortunate abandonment of the Bill introduced in November, 1879.

Act VI of 1880, with the local Acts it amended, was in force till 1886. Their continuance for five years unaltered, did a great deal to remove such evils as arose from frequent changes before. But there was still an unjust system of maximum everywhere, while the amount of maximum varied, and the classification essentially differed in different parts of India. The incidence differed with every class and the poor paid more in proportion than the rich, and the richer a man was, above a certain point, the less he had to pay. The measure was open to grave objections of principle and detail; and the legislation of 1886 was therefore welcome.¹⁷

The details of the provisions in the Acts that preceded the Act of 1886 are of little interest now as they do not throw much light either on the 1886 Act or its successors, the legislation of 1886 and again that of 1918 having made more or less a 'clean cut' with the past on each occasion.

(1) Speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Hope in 1886.

The general structure of the 1886 Act was as below. Income was divided into four classes—(1) Salaries, (2) Interest on Securities, (3) Profits of Joint Stock Companies, (4) Other income, which included income from house property. All income was taxed, except agricultural income and most of the incomes now exempted under section 4 (3), e.g., income of charities, were exempt either by the Act or by notifications. No tax was levied on the shareholder in respect of profits of companies which had already paid tax; nor was tax levied on the share received by a member of a Hindu undivided family. The rate of tax was 5 pies in the rupee on incomes over Rs. 2,000; salaries between Rs. 500 and Rs. 2,000 per annum and interest on securities were taxed at 4 pies per rupee. Income from other sources was taxed at fixed rates varying with the income (but roughly corresponding to 4 to 5 pies in the rupee). In 1903 the taxable minimum was raised to Rs. 1,000.

The machinery of the Act was simple. Except in very big cities, like Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, there were hardly any whole-time Income-tax Officers. The work was done by the Land Revenue Officers as a subsidiary activity. There was no obligation on individuals to furnish returns of income, nor, consequently, any penalty for not doing so. Tax on salaries of public servants and interest on securities was collected at source without much difficulty. Nor was there much trouble about Joint Stock Companies, which, however, were compelled to send returns of profits. But the law did not lay down any rules as to how profits were to be calculated. These details were regulated by rules or by executive orders. In respect of (4)—“Other Income”—which was by far the most important class, the Collector was allowed to assess summarily incomes below Rs. 2,000; and all that he had to do was to publish a list of such persons in his office, all of whom, unless they objected within 60 days, became finally liable to the tax. In other cases, the Collector merely notified each assessee what amount had been assessed as tax. There was also provision for the Collector's calling for, but not compelling the submission of returns of income. Any assessee could petition the Collector against the assessment; and assessee having to pay a tax of Rs. 250 or over and Companies had a right to apply to the Divisional Commissioner (or the Board of Revenue in Madras) for revision; and the Commissioner had discretion to entertain such applications even if the amount of tax was less. Both the Collector and the Commissioner had power to call for evidence, etc., but only at the instance of the petitioners or to verify facts alleged by them. The Collector had power to compound the assessment with an assessee—whether an individual or a Company—for a number of years.

It is unnecessary to detail the various minor amendments that were made to this Act from time to time. This simple machinery provided by this Act worked smoothly enough so long as the rate of tax was low. The rates fixed in 1886 were fixed with close reference to the cesses on land that had been imposed in the seventies of that century. So long as these low rates were in force, slight inequalities in assessment did not very much matter—either to the taxpayers or to the Government. In 1916, the War necessitated increased taxation and income-tax had to make up its share. The graduation was made steeper and the rates increased substantially.

The increase in the rates coupled with the steeper graduation called for a radical change in the whole system of assessment. The first change made was to provide for the refund of income-tax to shareholders of Companies (small incomes relief). This was in 1916. Pending a general revision of the Act, the necessity for which was felt, the law was amended in 1917 so as to compel, in the case of assesseees with an income of over Rs. 2,000, the production of returns on pain of a penalty both for false returns and for non-compliance. An assessee who failed to submit a return was also deprived of the right of appeal. These changes, however, were scarcely adequate, and far more drastic changes were required.

In the first place, it was necessary to abandon the old system of assessing a person's income in separate compartments, without reference to his income from the other compartments, and to assess him with reference to his income from all sources together. In the second place, higher rates of taxation required a greater degree of precision in arriving at taxable profits, etc., and it was therefore necessary to frame clear rules as to the calculation of profits, what expenses may be deducted from profits and what not. In the third place, the machinery of assessment also required tightening up. These defects were remedied by the 1918 Act under which the Collector was empowered to call for returns of income in all cases and for evidence in support of it, and if necessary to enforce the attendance of persons (including the assesseees) who could give useful information in connection with the assessments. Compounding taxes for a series of years was given up and new assessments could be made only for each year at a time based on the income of that year. The assessee was assessed provisionally on the income of the previous year and the assessment was finally adjusted at the end of the year with reference to the income of the year, the necessary refund or supplementary demand being made. The Commissioner of Income-tax was vested with discretion to refer doubtful cases to the High Court, suo motu or at the instance of the assessee, if any question arose with reference to the interpretation of any of the provisions of the Act or the rules made under it. Provision was also made to tax non-residents through their agents when the non-resident principals and their income could not be got at directly. This Act of 1918 was much nearer to the present Act in its general features than to the Act of 1886 which it superseded. An attempt was also made by Government--though without success--to provide for the taxation of income of married women jointly with the income of their husbands and also to take agricultural income into account in determining the rate of tax payable by an assessee on his non-agricultural income.

Within a few years, even the new Act showed that it required substantial revision. This, however, was not unexpected. The Government of India appointed Committees in each Province composed of both officials and non-officials to examine the questions that arose and make the necessary recommendations. When these Committees had reported, an All-India Committee was appointed in 1921 and the recommendations of this Committee formed the basis of the Act of 1922 which is in force now, though it has been materially amended in many respects by over twenty-five amending Acts since 1922, and notably, on an extensive scale, in 1939, apart from the formal amendments made by the Adaptation of Indian Laws Order in Council, 1937. The amendments made in 1939 were largely based on the recommendations of a Special Enquiry Committee, composed of two experts from England and one from India, which made an investigation in 1935 and 1936. The law has been further amended several times since 1939.

Super-tax.—A Super-tax was first levied in India in 1917. The tax was levied on incomes over Rs. 50,000, the tax being graduated on a 'slab' basis. The same rates were levied on Companies as on individuals and Hindu undivided families but, in the case of Companies, only the undistributed profits were taxed, the distributed profits being taxed in the hands of the shareholders, if they were liable to Super-tax, as part of their income. This arrangement discouraged the accumulation of undistributed profits and encouraged the distribution of profits beyond the limits of prudence and safety. The Act was accordingly recast in 1920 and the tax on Companies was levied on the entire profits less Rs. 50,000 at a flat rate of one anna in the rupee instead of on a graduated basis. The shareholder was not credited with the tax paid by the Company and the Super-tax on Companies became, all but in name, a Corporation Profits Tax. But unlike the Corporation Profits Tax elsewhere, it was not allowed to be deducted from taxable income for Income-tax purposes. In other respects the general framework of the 1917 Act remained practically unaltered. Both the 1917 and the 1920 Acts were small Acts of a few sections each which had to be read in conjunction with the Income-tax Acts of 1886 and 1918 which were referred to as the 'principal' Acts. When the Income-tax Act of 1918 was amended in 1922, the Super-tax Act also was incorporated therein and the present Act XI of 1922 as amended from time to time deals both with Super-tax and with Income-tax, the rates being fixed every year by the Finance Act. From 1939-40 companies pay Super-tax on the whole of their income without a free 'slab'.

Excess Profits Taxation.---An Excess Profits Duty was levied in India for one year, viz. 1919-20--see Act X of 1919. This duty was levied on the abnormal profits made by certain businesses in consequence of the then War.

An Excess Profits Tax was again levied in 1940--Act XV of 1940--taxing all excess profits made on or after the 1st September, 1939. This Act has been since amended several times. The law follows, generally, the corresponding legislation in the United Kingdom though differing in fairly important details.

SUMMARY OF PRESENT LAW.

The body of the Law is contained in Act XI of 1922 (as amended). The amendments in 1939 in particular have so much elaborated the provisions that it is difficult to summarise them without omitting many details, in themselves of considerable importance.

The Act relates to both Income-tax and Super-tax. Section 58, sub-section (1) mentions the sections that do not apply to Super-tax. The rates of Income-tax and Super-tax are prescribed by the annual Finance Act.

The tax is levied not only on income, as ordinarily understood, but on certain capital receipts which have been included in a special definition of 'income', such as certain bonus shares and debentures, and accumulated receipts from employer's contribution to provident funds [section 2 (6-C)]. 'Earned income', specially defined and broadly speaking, representing income from personal exertion is entitled to an allowance and is also not included, to a limited extent, in total income. (Section 15-A).

The tax is levied for each financial year (i.e., for the liability to the Exchequer for that year) on the income of the 'previous year,' as defined in section 2, sub-section (11) of the Act, that is, briefly, the previous financial year or a year ending on a date in the previous financial year up to which the assessee has made up his accounts. Thus, the tax is levied in arrear on an ascertained income, except in special cases, such as when a person is about to leave British India (section 24-A). An assessee cannot alter his accounting year, except with the consent of the Income-tax Officer. The financial year of Government ends on March 31st. The income of the previous year is both the basis and the measure of taxation. It is not as though the taxation was in respect of the income of the year in which the assessment was made, and that the income of the previous year was deemed by a statutory convention to be the measure of the income of the year of assessment. (In this respect the basis of the Excess Profits Tax is entirely different). Hence, no assessment is made in the first year in which a business is started, but the first assessment is made, after the close of the assessee's first accounting period, on the profits of that period.

Similarly, subject to certain provisions in sub-section (3) of section 25, relating to businesses that were taxed under the previous Income-tax Act, Act VII of 1918, and necessitated by the fact that, under the Act of 1918, the assessment was on the income of the year of assessment and tax was provisionally levied on the income of the previous year, subject to adjustment subsequently with reference to the ascertained income of the year of assessment, an assessment is made on a business after it has finally closed down on the profits of its last working account year. [Sub-section (1) of section 25.]

The principal charging sections are sections 3 and 4 in regard to Income-tax, and section 55 in regard to Super-tax. (The Privy Council have considered section 6 to be the real charging section, but that was in a different connection). Since 1st April, 1939, both the taxes are levied on the 'slab' system; prior to that date Super-tax was levied on the 'slab' system and Income-tax on the 'step' system, coupled with marginal relief at the stages where the rates increased. Further, as from 1st April, 1939, companies do not get a free first slab in respect of Super-tax.

The rate of tax increases with the successive slices or slabs of the 'total income' of the assessee, computed according to the provisions of section 16 i.e., including income taxed at source and certain kinds of income not taxed. The 'total income' and the 'taxable income' (a term that is not to be found in the Act), that is, the income to which the rate is to be applied, in order to determine the actual amount of tax payable, may, therefore, vary considerably.

An 'assessee' is defined in section 2, sub-section (2) as a person by whom Income-tax is payable. The Act recognises the following classes of assessee:—Individuals, Hindu undivided families, firms (registered or unregistered), companies, and other associations of persons, i.e., both individuals and associations. (Section 3.) The word 'person' is used in the Act with reference to all classes of assessee. It is specially declared to apply to a Hindu undivided family and to a local authority by section 2, sub-section (9). 'Firm' has the same meaning as in the Partnership Act, but registration for Income-tax purposes has no reference to registration under the Partnership Act. A 'registered firm' under the Income-tax Act is merely a 'firm' constituted under an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners, of which, the prescribed particulars have been registered by the Income-tax Officer in the prescribed manner under the provisions of section 26-A and under statutory rules made under it. [Section 2, sub-section (14)]. An 'unregistered firm' means any other firm. [Section 2, sub-section (16)]. 'Prescribed' means prescribed by rules made under section 59 of the Act by the Central Board of Revenue, subject to the control of the Central Government. Rules 2 to 6-B of the Rules framed under the Act relate to the 'registration' of firms.

An unregistered firm is to a large extent treated as an individual. It pays both Income-tax and Super-tax at the graduated rates, on successive slices of its income in excess of the free limit. A partner in an unregistered firm is not liable to Income-tax or Super-tax individually on his share in the profits of the firm if the firm has paid Income-tax and Super-tax thereon. [Proviso to section 55 and section 14 (2)]. But his share of the profits is included in his total income to regulate the rate of tax on his other income under section 17 (2). [See section 16 (1).]

As from 1st April, 1939, a registered firm is not taxed as such. Under section 23 (5) its total income (or loss) is determined and apportioned between its partners, i.e., included in their respective total incomes, tax being levied directly on them except in respect of tax not recoverable from non-resident partners. At the option of the Income-tax Officer, an unregistered firm may be dealt with like a registered firm.

The partner in a registered firm thus pays Income-tax and Super-tax on his share of the profits of the firm at the rates applicable to his total income including his share of the profits of the firm. The partner in an unregistered firm, on the other hand, suffers tax on his share of the profits of the firm at the rates applicable to the profits of the firm, which may be higher or lower than the rates applicable to his own total income. On the rest of his income, he suffers tax on the basis of section 17 (2), roughly speaking, on a pro rata basis.

In assessing a member of a Hindu undivided family to Income-tax or Super-tax, his share of the income of the family is not taken into account at all; it is not even included in his 'total income' for the purpose of determining his personal rate of tax. [Section 14 (1) and section 16 (1).]

The Act applies to five 'heads' of income, profits and gains:-- (1) Salaries, (2) Interest on Securities, (3) Income from Property, i.e., 'buildings or lands appurtenant thereto' of which the assessee is the 'owner,' and which he does not occupy for purposes of his business, profession or vocation [section 9, sub-section (1)], (4) profits and gains from Business, Profession or Vocation, and (5) Income from other sources. (Section 6.) All 'income, profits or gains' derived under any of these five heads is liable to the tax in accordance with the complicated provisions of sections 4, 4-A and 4-B, i.e., depending on where it accrues or arises or is received or deemed to accrue, etc. . . . and to whom it accrues, etc., i.e., whether he is resident or not, and ordinarily resident or not. Roughly speaking, a non-resident is taxed on income accruing, arising or received in British India, and a resident, on his world income, if ordinarily resident in British India; otherwise only on his British India income plus remittances from abroad unless his foreign income is from a business controlled in India (not British India) or a profession or vocation set up there, in which case, the whole income would be liable. An important exception in the case of residents deals with income in Indian States (sections 14 and 17). Such income is included in "total income", i.e., for rate purposes, but not taxed, except in certain cases, until it is brought into British India. 'Residence' and 'ordinary residence' are specially defined by rather complicated formulæ (sections 4-A and 4-B). Where foreign income is frozen, collection of tax on such income, if taxable, is postponed till the income is available (section 45).

'Salaries' include salaries paid by private as well as public employers. They also include fees, commissions and perquisites of all kinds, including the value of free quarters even though the quarters are not capable of conversion into money. They may be taxed on an 'accrued basis'. [Section 7 (1).] 'Business' includes any trade, commerce or manufacture or any adventure or concern in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture. [Section 2 (4).] There is no definition of a 'profession,' and for this we must seek guidance from rulings of courts.

There is no definition of what constitutes 'accruing or arising.' The views of courts have in the past oscillated between the idea of receivability in British India on the one hand and the location of the source or origin of income in British India on the other [see notes under sections 4 (1) and 42 (1)] and the position has become even more obscure as a consequence of the amendments in 1939 to sections 4 and 42.

Sections 7 to 13 describe how income shall be computed under each head. Salaries are income of the year in which they are received or due, as the case may be. The only deductions permissible are, subscriptions to Provident Funds constituted by Government or recognised under Chapter IX-A, and insurance premia, the aggregate deductions being limited to 1/6th of the total income of the assessee. These deductions, however, cannot be claimed for Super-tax. (Sections 7, 15, 16 and 58.) Section 8 deals with interest on securities, and section 9 deals with property which is taxed on a notional income, i.e., on the 'annual value' which is defined as the sum for which the property might reasonably be expected to be let from year to year. Deductions are allowed for repairs, insurance premia, charges on the property, interest, land revenue, collection charges and vacancies. Also, if the house is not let but occupied by the owner the annual value is limited to 10 per cent. of the total income of the owner. Section 10 deals with business, profession or vocation carried on by the assessee. Subject to various restrictions, particularly with reference to payments to partners and to interest and salaries payable abroad, it allows for the following deductions, viz., rent paid for business premises and repairs thereto, interest on borrowed capital, insurance premia, repairs of plant, machinery, etc., depreciation and discarding of plant, machinery, etc., land revenue and local rates, etc., on the premises and all expenditure (other than capital expenditure) incurred solely for the purpose of the business, profession or vocation. Section 12 which deals with income from "other sources" similarly allows for the deduction of all expenditure (other than capital or personal expenditure) incurred solely for earning the profits or gains, subject, however, to certain exceptions similar to those in section 10. Over and above the deductions referred to above, an allowance is admissible, since 1945, in respect of 'earned income' for the purpose of income-tax (but not for super-tax); and a part of the 'earned income' is also not included in total income.

Section 13 deals with the method of accounting under sections 10 and 12. Under sections 7 to 9 the problem of the method of accounting does not ordinarily arise. Under section 9, it is a notional receipt and not the actual receipt that is taxed. It is only in respect of sections 10 and 12 therefore, that the question of method of accounting has to be considered. Under section 13, the income should be computed in accordance with the method of accounting regularly employed by the assessee, but if no method has been regularly employed or if the method employed obscures the real profits, the Income-tax Officer has absolute discretion to compute the income as he thinks best.

An assessee may set off the profits under one source against losses under another. Partners of registered firms including such unregistered firms as are taxed like registered firms under section 23 (5), but not partners of other unregistered firms, are allowed to set off their shares or net loss of the firm (after it has had set off) against their other profits.

An assessee is allowed to carry forward his losses (including the apportioned losses of a registered firm) and set them off against profits from the same business, profession or vocation up to a limit of six years (the limit being one year in respect of loss of 1939-40, two years in respect of that of 1940-41 and so on till the limit of six years is reached).

Both Income-tax and Super-tax are deducted at the time of payment by every person paying salaries. On Interest on Securities, normally only Income-tax is collected at source and at the maximum rate, but in special cases Super-tax also is collected at appropriate rates, as also in respect of dividends to non-residents in certain circumstances. Tax deducted at source is collected in advance, on behalf of the assessee who will be assessed the next year and meantime the deductions at source are held to his credit. (Section 18.) 'Securities' means securities of the Government of India or a Local Government, and debentures or other securities for money issued by or on behalf of a local authority or a company. (Section 8.) It should be noted that interest on debentures issued by a company is allowed as a deduction from the taxable profits of the company, except in respect of certain foreign debentures in respect of which tax has not been deducted at source. Income-tax on interest or securities is deducted at the maximum rate, but certificates are issued by Income-tax Officers authorizing the collection of tax at lower rates, if the probable total income of the assessee justifies it [Proviso to section 18 (3)]. Owners of securities and persons in receipt of salaries are entitled to a refund, if eligible with reference to their total income in the year. (Section 48.) Non-resident aliens are not eligible for refunds at all; other non-residents are allowed refunds on the basis of their world-income. (Section 17.) The tax on dividends is recovered as follows. Every company is liable to Income-tax on its profits, at the prescribed maximum rate and the tax paid by the company is deemed to have been paid on behalf of the shareholder [Section 18 (5)]. Every shareholder is entitled, if he is not liable to pay tax at the maximum rate, on his personal 'total income,' including the dividends, to a refund calculated on his dividends received from any company whose profits are liable to Indian Income-tax, at the difference between the rate applicable to his personal total income and the maximum rate borne by the company. [Sections 18 (5) and 48.] Under the Finance Act, Super-tax is levied on the entire profits of every company at a flat rate. This Company Super-tax is regarded as a Corporation Profits tax, and is not regarded as in any sense paid by the company on behalf of the shareholder. Consequently, a shareholder cannot get any refund in respect of the Company Super-tax that he has indirectly suffered on his dividends. Further, if his income including his dividends exceeds the free limit, he is liable to pay Super-tax, irrespective of whether the company has paid the Company Super-tax on its profits or not. A company that holds shares in another company is liable to the Company Super-tax on its profits (including dividends received from the 'held' company) irrespective of whether the 'held' company has paid the Company Super-tax or not, but by special notification under section 60, "investment companies," which have been specially defined for the purpose, are exempt from such multiple taxation.

The 'principal officer' of a company may, in certain circumstances, be required to deduct Super-tax from dividends payable to a non-resident shareholder. So also, in certain circumstances as already stated, a person paying Interest. In the case also of a subscriber to a recognised Provident Fund, receiving the non-exempt part of his accumulations, Super-tax is collected by deduction at source. (Section 18.)

In 1944, section 18-A was added, under which an assessee has to pay provisionally during the year of income—or rather the financial year preceding the financial year in which the regular assessment falls due—in four or less instalments—the estimated tax due on his income from sources to which section 18 is not applicable, this provisional payment being automatically adjusted when the regular assessment is made. This section was introduced as an anti-inflationary measure and will therefore be presumably removed when conditions change after the war, and indicate the need for reflationary measures.

Assessments are made by 'Income-tax Officers'. From 1st April, 1939, persons with taxable income are bound to furnish returns of income suo motu, in response to a general notice published by the local Income-tax Officer. The latter also has power to require persons, whom he considers to have derived a taxable income, to make a return of their total income in the prescribed form. [Section 22, sub-section (2).] Failure to make a return renders the defaulter liable to prosecution [Section 51 (c)] or to penalties under section 28. The Income-tax Officer can also call on an assessee to produce accounts or other evidence. [Sections 22 (4), 23 (2), 23 (3) and 37.] To enforce the production of evidence by third parties and also to compel the personal attendance of the assessee, if necessary, the Income-tax Officer has been given the powers of a Court (Section 37) and false evidence given before him is perjury under the Indian Penal Code (section 52). The law also provides for the making of supplementary assessment in respect of 'escaped' income within four years (or eight in cases of concealment) (Section 34) and for the rectification of apparent mistakes within four years (Section 35). Against the Income-tax Officer's assessment, an appeal lies to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. It is also open to the assessee to move the Income-tax Officer to re-open "default" assessments, if he can show that his default was due to "sufficient cause"; and a right of appeal lies to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner against the order of the Income-tax Officer refusing to re-open such assessment. (Sections 27 and 30.) Both the assessee and the Department can appeal against the orders of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner to the Appellate Tribunal (Section 32). The Commissioner has also power to revise, either suo motu or at the instance of the assessee, any order passed by any of his subordinates, but in no circumstances to the prejudice of the assessee, always provided (broadly) that the assessee waives or has lost his rights of appeal. (Section 33.) In any case in which there is a right of appeal under section 32 and it has been exercised, the assessee or the Commissioner may require the Appellate Tribunal to refer any question of law arising out of the appellate order to the High Court. [Section 66, sub-section (1).] When the Tribunal rejects a petition for reference on the ground of time bar, a preliminary reference on that point lies to the High Court. If the Tribunal refuses to make a reference, the assessee may move the High Court direct to order the Tribunal to make a reference [For five years from 1931, when the minimum taxable limit of income was lowered from Rs. 2,000 to Rs. 1,000, the successive Finance Acts provided for a procedure of summary assessment of incomes below Rs. 2,000.

Roughly stated, it was open to the Income-tax Officer to assess such a person without calling for a return of income and it was open to the assessee who so received a notice of demand, to file a return of income and have his case dealt with under the ordinary procedure].

Again, from 1942 to 1945 inclusive, the Finance Acts provide for a summary procedure for the depositing with a Government of certain fixed sums in lieu of taxation in the case of incomes below Rs. 2,000 per annum, and also for the refund, to assessee with incomes not exceeding Rs. 6,000 per annum, of a fraction of the tax.

The functions of the Civil Courts are strictly limited to the disposal by the High Courts of references on points of law. (Section 67.) An appeal lies to the Privy Council from the decision of the High Court if the High Court certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal. (Section 66-A.)

Income-tax Officers, Assistant Commissioners, both Appellate and Inspecting, and Commissioners of Income-tax and members of the Appellate Tribunal, are all Government officials. (Sections 5 and 5-A.)

Assistant Commissioners may be either Inspecting or Appellate, and the statute requires the Income-tax Officer, in certain specific cases, to act with the previous approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner. No directions may be given by higher authority to appellate Assistant Commissioners in the discharge of their appellate functions.

Tax is recovered either by the Income-tax Officer himself [Sections 45 and 46 (1)] or by the Collector of the District as an arrear of land revenue [Section 46 (2)] or as an arrear of Municipal tax or other local rate. [Section 46 (3).] Except in certain special cases, no proceedings may be started for the recovery of any arrears after one year. [Section 46 (7).]

For the taxation of Hindu undivided families in the first year after partition, see section 25-A.

There are special provisions for the taxation of tramp ships (sections 44-A to 44-C), the taxation of certain classes of persons, under disability cestui que trusts and non-residents (sections 40 to 43), and for the taxation of transferred and discontinued business (sections 25 and 26); also for the taxation of persons about to leave British India and of executors of deceased persons (sections 24-A and 24-B.).

There are special sets of provisions to deal with cases in which tax is evaded, e.g., section 16 (1) (c) and (3)—transfer of income by trusts or to wife and minor children, and partnership with wife or minor children; section 23 (5)—option to assess a firm either as registered or as unregistered; section 23-A—treating certain companies as having distributed all their profits; section 44-D—transfer of assets abroad; and sections 44-E and 44-F “bondwashing”.

Any notice or requisition under the Act can be served by registered post or as a summons under the Civil Procedure Code. (Section 63.) An assessee may appear in all Income-tax proceedings either in person or by a duly authorised representative, who should be a lawyer or an accountant or an “Income-tax practitioner” or an employee or a relative. (Section 61.) Every person deducting or paying tax in accordance with the Act, on income belonging to another person is indemnified. (Section 65.)

All documents, accounts, etc., which officers of the Income-tax Department receive in connection with assessments, appeals, etc., are confidential; and the disclosure of any of these, except for the purposes of the Act, and certain other specified purposes, is an offence punishable with imprisonment for six months and also a fine. No such prosecution may be made except at the instance of the Commissioner. (Section 54.)

The law exempts the following kinds of income from taxation [section 4 (3)]—Income of charitable and religious trusts including voluntary contributions received by such institutions, income of local authorities, but not income from business outside their jurisdiction, interest on securities held by certain Provident funds, casual and non-recurring receipts not arising from the exercise of a business, profession or vocation, agricultural income and special allowances given to meet expenditure incurred in connection with the performance of duties. Power is also given to the Central Government under section 60 to exempt, or modify the tax in favour of any class of persons or any class of income and to give relief in individual cases to persons receiving in a single year heavy arrears of salary relating to earlier years but the former power can be used after 1st April, 1939, only to restrict relief already granted and not to extend such relief or grant relief in new cases.

The exemption of contributions to, and of the income from investments of, Provident Funds to which the Provident Funds Act, 1925, does not apply is regulated by an elaborate code of provisions—chiefly Chapter IX-A, section 4 (3) (ix) and section 15 (3); so also, in respect of Superannuation Funds. Chapter IX-B.

The law also provides for the refund of a part of the Income-tax paid on income which has been taxed both in India and in the United Kingdom (section 49) and permits the Government to make similar arrangements, by notification, with Indian States and other parts of the British Empire. (Section 49-A.) There are special arrangements by Orders in Council with certain parts of the British Empire.

The law provides for the levy of penalties by the Income-tax Officer, for the following offences—for not giving notice of discontinuance of business (section 25), for concealment of income (section 28), for not furnishing returns (ibid.) and for delay in paying tax [section 46 (1)]. It also provides for the prosecution before a Magistrate of persons who fail to perform the duties with which they are charged under the Act, e.g., failure to submit returns or accounts, failure to collect or pay the tax deducted at source, refusal to allow books to be seen. Such prosecutions can be made only at the instance of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner who can also compound the offence. Sections 51 to 53.)

CONSTRUCTION—RULES OF.

As regards the rules of construction of Statutes, the reader is referred to any standard text-book on the Interpretation of Statutes. The general rules, however, are summarised below; and a few authorities have been cited, more especially those relating to Revenue cases.

Words—Construction of.—The rules about construction of words are as below:

If a special definition of a word or words is given in the Act, it should be adopted if not repugnant to the context, Reg. v. Govind and others, 16 Bom. 283; failing this, the definition, if any, in the General Clauses Act of the same legislature, Woomesh Chunder Bose v. Soorjee Kanto Roy Chowdhry, 5 Cal. 713; and failing this the meaning should be ascertained by ordinary rules. It is unsafe to refer to definition clauses in other statutes even of the same legislature, Adamson v. Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works, 1929 A.C. 142. If there are interpretation clauses in the statute referring to other Acts [e.g., "Public servants" in section 2 (13) or "judicial proceeding" in section 37 of the Income-tax Act] it should not be assumed that the thing defined has annexed to it every incident attached to it in the other Act by the legislature, Uma Churn Bag v. Ajadunnissa Bibee, 12 Cal. 430.

The first ordinary rule of interpretation of words is, that words importing a popular meaning when employed in a statute, ought to be construed in the popular sense, unless the legislature has defined the words in any other sense, Reg. v. Imam Ali, etc., 10 All. 150; Yorkshire, etc., Co. v. Clayton, 1 Tax Cases, 479, 485. "What we ought to do in this case, it not being free from difficulty, is to choose that which, I should say, is the natural meaning of a word used in a statute not specially relating at all to the technicalities of real property law or to conveyancing in particular, but relating to a matter of business, for this is a Finance Act and therefore using language which is to be read from a business point of view,"—per Kennedy, J., in Commissioners, Inland Revenue v. Gribble, (1913) 3 K.B. 212, followed by Sankcy, J., in Neville Reid & Co. v. Commissioners, Inland Revenue, 1 A.T.C. 237; 12 Tax Cases 545; see also Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Ellis Reid, 55 Bom. 312. But words of known legal import are to be considered to have been used in their technical sense or according to their strict acceptation unless there appears to be a manifest intention of using them in the popular sense, Rhedoykrishna Ghose v. Koylash Chunder Bose, 4 B.L.R. 82, 91; Collector of Trichinopoly v. Lekamani, 14 B.L.R. 115; Special Commissioners v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53. Regard should therefore be given to any peculiar sense which words may have acquired in Indian law. On the other hand, particular words may have a different meaning in a taxing Act from what they would have in an Act of another kind. Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewery. 4 Tax Cas. 54. And in any case the words of a statute should be understood in the sense they bore when the statute was passed, Yorkshire, etc., Co. v. Clayton, 1 Tax Cases 483; Girwar Singh v. Thakur Narain Singh, 14 Cal. 730. If, however, the context or the declared intention of the Act or provisions contained in other parts of the Act, e.g., the absence of machinery to carry into effect the wider, and possible, meaning show that general words are not to be read in their understood sense, they must receive a more limited meaning, Shidlingapa v. Karisbasapa, 11 Bom. 599; Reg. v. Ramchandra Narayan and another, 22 Bom. 152; Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490. In Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490, in which the assessee resided in the United Kingdom and profits accrued or arose to him from business outside the United Kingdom, it was contended on behalf of the assessee that on the analogy of certain decisions under the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts, which, without the limitations imposed by the decisions, would have applied even if neither the testator nor the legatee nor the property was within or had some relation to the United Kingdom, the Income-tax Act also should be limited in its application. The House of Lords held that the Acts were not analogous. In the Income-tax Act, specific limits are laid down as to who is taxable and in respect of what part of his income, whereas the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts imposed no such definite limits. At the same time, "I am far from denying that if it can be shown that a particular interpretation of a taxing statute would operate unreasonably in the case of a foreigner sojourning in this country, it would afford a reason for adopting some other interpretation if it were possible consistently with the ordinary canons of construction.”—Per Lord Herschell in Colquhoun v. Brooks, (supra, at p. 504.) Unless explicitly stated otherwise, when a statute deals with things in general words, it deals only with things over which the legislature has jurisdiction (ibid).

If general words are used it must be assumed that the Legislature is dealing only with persons and things or circumstances within its territory. Clear and precise words are necessary before an Act can be taken to apply to matter beyond such jurisdiction, Jeffreys v. Boosey, (1854) 4 H.L. Cases 815; Colquhoun v. Heddon, (1890) 2 Tax Cases 621; R. v. Jameson, (1896) 2 Q.B. 424.

“ . . . in any case the Crown does not tax by analogy but by statute . . . it is not for us to say, nor do we know, what the Legislature may or may not have meant, apart from their words, by which we are bound alike to what they say and in what they do not. Words which impose tax in general terms may still receive a particular limitation when the computation rules omit the directions appropriate and indispensable to levying the tax in a particular case,” per Lord Sumner in Ormond Investment Co., Ltd. v. Betts, 13 Tax Cases 400; 1928 A.C. 143 at p. 158.

If the construction of words in a technical sense produces inequality and in a popular sense equality, the latter may be chosen, Special Commissioners v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53. There is no presumption in favour of the exemption of a few from the incidents of a general tax; on the contrary, the presumption is in favour of equality and against the partiality implied by exemptions. Equality and impartial justice in the incidence of taxation are of greater moment than the construction of taxing statutes in a liberal sense favourable to the subject, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa v. Maharaja Visvesvar Singh, 14 Pat. 785; 1935 I.T.R. 216.

In an enumeration of different subjects general words following specific words may be construed with reference to the antecedent matters and the construction restricted by treating them as applying to things of the same kind as those previously mentioned, John Poulson, etc. v. Madhusudan Paul Chowdhry, 1 B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 101 at p. 105; Trustees of Psalms and Hymns v. Whitwell, 3 Tax Cases 7; Ystradyfodwg, etc., Board v. Benstead, 5 Tax Cases 230, unless, of course, there be something to show that a wider sense was intended (Maxwell on Statutes, 6th edition, pp. 592-593). This is known as the doctrine of eiusdem generis. But this doctrine cannot apply when each of the words preceding the general word is generically distinct from the rest and is exhaustive of its own genus, In re Purna Chunder Pal, 27 Cal. 1023, or when only one specific word precedes the general word, Rex v. Special Commissioners: Ex parte Shaftesbury Homes, etc., 8 Tax Cases 367. There is no room for this doctrine in the absence of any mention of a genus, and the mention of a single species by itself cannot constitute a genus. Thus, where a company was liable for “water rates” but otherwise exempted from ‘taxation’, it was unsuccessfully contended by the Crown that the Company was exempt only from taxation of the nature of water rates, i.e., from local taxation only. United Towns Electric Co. v. Attorney-General of Newfoundland. 18 A.T.C. 294 (P.C.). Language is always used secundum subjectam materiam and it must therefore be understood in the sense which best harmonises with the subject-matter, Chartered, etc., Bank v. Wilson, 1 Tax Cases 192. When considering what is of ambiguous import the whole context ought to be regarded, Reith v. Westminster School, 6 Tax Cases 486.

A word which occurs more than once in the same Act should be construed uniformly unless a definition in the Act or the context shows that the word has been used in varying senses, (Bajinath v. Sital Singh, 13 All. 224, where the point is discussed at length, Mahomed Akil v. Assadunnissa Bibee, B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 774); Colquhoun v. Heddon, 2 Tax Cas 628.

Unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, words importing the masculine gender include females; and words in the singular, the plural and vice versa. (Section 13 of the General Clauses Act.)

The following words deserve special mention:

Include.—"Shall include" is a phrase of extension, and not one of restrictive definition; it is not equivalent to "shall mean", R. v. Kershaw, 6 E. & B. 1007; 26 L.J.M.C. 19; R. v. Hermann, 48 L.J.M.C. 106; 4 Q.B. D. 284; 27 W.R. 475; 40 L.T. 263.

"The word 'include' is very generally used in Interpretation Clauses in order to enlarge the meaning of words or phrases occurring in the body of the statute; and when it is so used, these words or phrases must be construed as comprehending not only such things as they signify according to their natural import but also those things which the interpretation clause declares that they shall include. But, 'include' is susceptible of another construction which may become imperative, if the context of the Act is sufficient to show that it was not merely employed for the purpose of adding to the natural significance of the words or expressions defined. It may be equivalent to 'mean and include,' and in that case it may afford an exhaustive explanation of the meaning which, for the purposes of the Act, must invariably be attached to these words or expressions"—Lord Watson in Dilworth v. Commissioner of Stamps, 1899 A.C. 99, 105, 106; 68 L.J.P.C. 4; see also R. v. Govind and others, 16 Bom. 283; Vyankaji v. Sarjee Rao Appaji Rao, 16 Bom. 537.

May.—Though dicta of eminent Judges may be cited to the contrary, it seems plain conclusion that 'may,' 'it shall be lawful,' 'it shall and may be lawful,' 'empowered,' 'shall hereby have power,' 'shall think proper', and such like phrases, give, in their ordinary meaning, an enabling and discretionary power. "They are potential and never (in themselves) significant of any obligation,"—Lord Selborne in Julius v. Oxford, (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214, 235. "They confer a faculty or power, and they do not, of themselves, do more than confer a faculty or power"; and therefore, where the point in question is not covered by authority, "it lies upon those who contend that an obligation exists to exercise this power, to shew, in the circumstances of the case, something which, according to the principles I have mentioned, creates this obligation,"—Lord Cairns in Julius v. Oxford, (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214. On that case Cotton, L.J., observed: "'May' never can mean 'must,' so long as the English language retains its meaning; but it gives a power, and then it may be a question in what cases, where a Judge has a power given him by the word 'may,' it becomes his duty to exercise that power,"—Re Baker: Nichols v. Baker, 59 L.J. Ch. 661; 44 Ch.D. 262.

Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (Supra.) may be regarded as the leading case on the principles therein referred to by Lord Cairns for construing as obligatory, phrases which in their ordinary meaning, are merely enabling. His Lordship, in that case, gathers those principles into the following proposition:—

“Where a power is deposited with a public officer for the purpose of being used for the benefit of persons (1) who are specifically pointed out, and (2) with regard to whom a definition is supplied by the Legislature of the conditions upon which they are entitled to call for its exercise, that power ought to be exercised, and the Court will require it to be exercised,” Julius v. Oxford, (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214, 225.

And the following supplemental proposition may be gathered from the judgment of Lord Blackburn in the same case:—

Enabling words are construed as compulsory, whenever the object of the power is to effectuate a legal right; and if the object of the power is to enable the donee to effectuate a legal right, then it is the duty of the donee of the power to exercise the power, when those who have the right, call upon him to do so.

“May”, and such enabling words as those above referred to, therefore, group themselves into two classes according as they impose or give:—

I. An Obligatory Duty;

II. A Discretionary or Enabling Power.

(Stroud's Jud. Dictionary, Vol. II. pp. 1173, 1174.)

See Alcock Ashdown & Co. v. Chief Revenue Authority, 1 I.T.C. 221 where the Privy Council applied the above principles in construing “may” in section 51 of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1918.

Discretion.—“Where something is left to be done according to the discretion of the authority on whom the power of doing it is conferred, the discretion must be exercised honestly and in the spirit of the statute, otherwise the act done would not fall within the statute. ‘According to his discretion,’ means, it has been said, according to the rules of reason and justice, not private opinion, Rooke's Case, 5 Rep. 100-A; Keighley's Case, 10 Rep. 140-B; Eastwick v. City of London, Style, 42-43; per Willes, J. in Lee v. Bude Ry., L.R. 6 C.P. 576; 40 L.J.C.P. 288, according to law and not humour; it is to be not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular, per Lord Mansfield in R. v. Wilkes, 4 Bur. 2839, to be exercised not capriciously, but on judicial grounds and for substantial reasons, per Jessel, M. R. in Re Taylor, 4 Ch. D. 160; 46 L.J. Ch. 400; and per Lord Blackburn, in Doherty v. Allman, (1878) 3 App. Cas. 728. And it must be exercised within the limits to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself, per Lord Kenyon, in Wilson v. Rastall, 4 T. R. 757, that is, within the limits and for the objects intended by the legislature.” (Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes 7th Edn., pp. 109, 110).

You cannot lay down a hard and fast rule as to the exercise of Judicial Discretion, for the moment you do that “the discretion of the Judge is fettered,” per Brett, M. R., in re Friedeberg, 54 L.J.P.D. & A. 75; (1885) 10 P.D. 112; Cf. per Bowen, L.J., in Jones v. Curling, 53 L.J.Q.B. 373; 13 Q.B.D. 262. (Stroud's Jud. Dictionary, p. 542.) See also S.P.K.A. A.M. Chettyar Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 4 I.T.C. 182.

Year.—The word “year” is used in varying senses in the Act. But it will be seen from the notes under each section that the Act uses it normally in the sense of the financial year or that of the "previous year", i.e., the accounting period relating to the financial year, except where it is clear from the context that the year contemplated is something else, i.e., either a period of 365 days or the Calendar year.

Territorial limitation.—As regards such limitation on the Income-tax Acts, see Whitney v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 10 Tax Cas 88; 1926 A. C. 37 referred to in the notes under section 22 (4); London and South American Trust v. British Tobacco Co., 42 T.L.R. 771; Governor-General in Council v. Raleigh Investments, 1944 I.T.R. 265 (F.C.); Wallace Brothers v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1945 I.T.R. 39 (F.C.); both referred to under section 1, the latter two holding that there is nothing to prevent the Indian Legislature from passing extra-territorial legislation.

Title and Preamble.—In England, it appears to have been a matter of dispute at one time whether the title of an Act should be taken into account in interpreting a statute. The title and preamble however were considered in the Pemsel case about charities, Special Commissioners v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53; see also Fielding v. Morley Corporation, (1899) 1 Ch. 1, 3 and Attorney-General v. Margate Pier Co., (1900) 1 Ch. 749. In India it appears to be the accepted practice to refer to the title in construing the meaning of doubtful portions of the Act, Mahomed Akil v. Assadunnissa Bibee, B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 774. Although the preamble is not a part of the enactment but only a recital, Brindaban Chunder Sircar Chowdhry v. Brindaban Chandra Dey Chowdhry, 13 B.L.R. 408; Collector of Trichinopoly v. Lukkamani, 1 I.A. 282, it furnishes the key to the construction of the Statute, Nga Hoong v. The Queen, 7 Moore's I.A. 72. But it can be quoted only when the substantive part of the enactment is ambiguous; if not, the substantive portion prevails and the preamble cannot override it, Ganesh Krishnaji v. Krishnaji, 14 Bom. 387, 389; Nga Hoong v. The Queen, 7 Moore's I.A. 72; Chinna Aiyar v. Mahomed Fakiruddin Saib, 2 Mad. 322. The preamble may also be resorted to in restraint of the generality of the enacting clause, when it would be inconvenient if not restrained, Karunakar Mahati v. Niladhro Chowdhry, 5 B.L.R. 652, 656.

Title of Chapter.—If the words of an enacting section admit of any reasonable doubt, the title or bearing of any part or chapter may be looked to in interpreting the section, Sah Mukhun Lall v. Sah Koondun Lall, 15 B. L.R. 228; Inglis v. Robertson, 1898 A.C. 616; but these words cannot be taken to restrict the plain terms of the enacting section, if they do not admit of reasonable doubt, R. v. Ayyakannu, 21 Mad. 293; Kishori Singh v. Sabdal Singh and another, 12 All. 553.

Punctuation and Marginal Notes.—In England, punctuation and marginal notes cannot ordinarily be referred to for the purpose of construing a statute. London Library v. Carter, 2 Tax Cases 594, 597, but in Torrens v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Tax Case 268, marginal notes, though not part of the sections, were referred to as being of some assistance in showing the drift of the sections. In India, while there seems to be unanimity that, where the meaning of the enactment is clear, the punctuation and marginal notes cannot be referred to, there have been some cases in which, as the text of the section was ambiguous, punctuation marks have been referred to in order to remove the ambiguity. Commissioner of Income-tax v. Nirmal Kumar Singh Nowlakshya, 2 I.T.C. 20; Board of Revenue v. S. R. M. A. R. Ramanathan Chettiar, 1 I.T.C. 214; Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 4 I.T.C. 15; Moham- mad Aslam v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., 1936 I.T.R. 412 (All.). It has been held that marginal notes cannot be referred to, Punardeo v. Ramsarup, 25 Cal. 858; Balraj Kunwar v. Jagathpal Singh, 26 All. 393, but these have sometimes been referred to, Bushell v. Hammond, (1904) 73 L.J.K.B. 1005; Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lal Mullick, 21 Cal. 732; Kameshwar Prasad v. Bhikan Narain Singh, 20 Cal. 609.

Schedules and Forms.—Schedules and forms are part of the Act; but if the schedule conflicts with the main enacting part, the latter prevails, Attorney-General v. Lamplugh, (1878) L.R. 3 Ex. D. 214. The same principles will presumably also apply to the forms and Schedules in the Rules. Reference has been made in one case to the form of return of income prescribed under the Act in order to construe one of the sections of the Act, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Arunachalam Chetti, 44 M. 65; 1 I.T.C. 75. The question whether the form of notice of demand under section 29 of the Act by intendment prescribed a period of limitation of one year for the issue thereof has been considered in Rajendra Narain v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 82, and it has been held that the forms issued under the Act may be altered by the Revenue authorities in case of necessity and that such necessary alterations would be valid. The mere incompleteness of a prescribed form, however, is an uncertain guide to the construction of the statute to which it applies, Ormond Investment Co., Ltd. v. Betts, 13 Tax Cases 400 (see the judgments of Lords Buckmaster and Sumner). The notes in the various forms appearing under the Rules framed under the Act have the same validity as the Act itself, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. P. K. N. P. R. Firm, 8 Rang. 209.

Proceedings of the Legislature.—The proceedings of the Legislature which precede the passing of an Act, including the statement of objects and reasons, cannot be referred to as legitimate aids to the construction of a particular section or sections of the Act, Assam Trading etc. Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Tax Cas 537 (H.L.); Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lal Mullick, 22 Cal. 788. But they may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the object of an Act, Shaik Mooso v. Shaik Essa, 8 Bom. 241. In certain circumstances it may be admissible to look at a later Act for assistance in the construction of an earlier Act, Investors Mortgage Security Co. v. Sinton, (1924) Sc. L. R.; Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue, (1921) 2 K.B. 403; Smidh & Co. v. Greenwood, 8 Tax Cases 193; and Ormond Investment Co., Ltd. v. Betts, 13 Tax Cases 400, but general and ambiguous words of a later statute should not be relied upon to abrogate the clear intention of an earlier Act, Attorney-General v. Excter Corporation, 5 Tax Cases 629. The report of a Royal Commission may be referred to for information as to the evil or defect which an Act was intended to remedy, but not as to the true meaning of the language used in the statute. The intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words of the statute, with such extraneous assistance as is legitimate, Assam Railways and Trading Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Tax Cases 509; 50 T.L.R. 540 (H.L.).

Literal Construction.—A statute should be construed literally, i.e., Courts of law can discover the intention of the legislature only from the terms used and are not at liberty to speculate upon the existence of an intention, inconsistent with the plain and obvious meaning of such terms and derived merely by inference from the general nature of the objects dealt with by the statute, Sheehy v. Lord Muskerry, 1 H.L. Cases 576 quoted in Mahomed Akil v. Assadunnissa Bibee, B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 774, at p. 865. If the words of a statute are clear, it is not the function of a Court to criticise the words and struggle to find some other way of construing them, because the words of the Legislature are the text of the law and must be obeyed and not criticised, Attorney-General v. Exeter Corporation, 5 Tax Cases 629. It is not for the Courts to decline to give effect to a clearly expressed statute because it may lead to apparent hardship, Young & Co. v. Mayor of Leamington, 8 A.C. 517, 522; Haji Abdul Rahiman v. Khoja Khaki Aruth, 11 Bom. 6, 18; Balkaran Rai v. Gobind Nath Tiwari, 12 All. 129. "It is far better that we should abide by the words of a statute than seek to reform it according to the supposed intention," Coe v. Lawrence, 1 E. & B. 516; Rangaswami Naickan v. Varadappa Naickan, 17 Mad. 462, 464 (F.B.). "An accidental inequality in the working of a rule cannot override its plain meaning," Kirke's Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 11 Tax Cases 323; (1927) S.L.T. (H.L.) 56.

The Legislature must be assumed to have intended what it has said. A Court of Law cannot assume that the legislature has made a mistake, Special Commissioners v. Pemscl, 3 Tax Cases 53. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Dalgety & Co., 15 Tax Cases 234. But literal construction may be departed from in favour of a liberal or beneficial construction, if the literal construction would create great difficulty and injustice which it cannot be supposed that the Legislature contemplated, having regard to the language and tenor of the rest of the Act, Mahomed Ewaz v. Brij Lal and another, 1 All. 465, 471 (P.C.). When the main object and intention of a statute are clear, it must not be reduced to a nullity by the draftsman's unskilfulness or ignorance of law except in the case of necessity or absolute intractability of the language used, Salmon v. Duncombe, 11 A.C. 627, 634 (P.C.). But if the language is ambiguous, the construction should be made with reference to the literal and grammatical sense of the words, Tulsidas Dhunji v. Virbussappa, 4 Bom. 624, with reference to the other passages in the Act, Mahomed Ewaz v. Brij Lal and another, 1 All. 465 (P.C.), the object of the legislation, R. v. Gangaram, 16 All. 136, history of the legislation, Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lall Mullick, 22 Cal. 788, its policy, Sreenath Bhattacharjee v. Ramcomal Gangopadhyaya, 10 Moore's I.A. 220, and scheme, Gould v. Curtis, 6 Tax Cases 293, and also with reference to the consequences of the construction, Dato Dudheswar v. Vithu, 20 Bom. 408. A gap in the law cannot be filled by a strained construction, Malayalam Plantations v. Clark, 19 Tax Cases 325, nor by adding words not in the Statute Jackson's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, 10 Tax Cases 476. Even if the words are plain, one is entitled and bound to have regard not to the mere language only, but to the subject-matter with which the Legislature is dealing and to the history of that subject-matter, at any rate, in so far as it is embodied in statutes, Attorney-General v. Exeter Corporation, 5 Tax Cases 629. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, 1939 I.T.R. 48 (P.C.). Generally speaking, ambiguous words must be construed with reference to the Act in which they occur and the purpose for which the words are used, Trustees of Mary Clark Home v. Anderson, 5 Tax Cases 48.

As between two or more possible interpretation of a section that one should be preferred which is least oppressive or unreasonable, Quarter Sessions of Glamorgan v. Wilson, 5 Tax Cases 452; In re Weaver's Hall, 1 Tax Cases 19; but words cannot be twisted to meet hard cases. Leitch v. Emmott, 14 Tax Cases 642. An Act should therefore, be applied in terms unless the apparent anomalies can be resolved by accepted canons of construction, Perry v. Astor, 19 Tax Cases 288.

Once it is fixed that there is liability, it is antecedently highly improbable that the statute should not go on to make that liability effective. A statute is meant to be workable and its interpretation should be to secure its object unless crucial omission or clear direction makes that end unattainable. Accordingly, a collecting section, as distinguished from a taxing section, may receive a liberal (i.e., in favour of the Crown) as opposed to a strict interpretation, Whitney v. Inland Revenue, 10 Tax Cases 88 (H.L.); Drummond v. Collins, 6 Tax Cases 525 (H.L.).

A mere suspicion, however well founded, that the Legislature had not in mind a particular case when framing an Act will not justify a strained construction of the language used in the Act, whether the language was chosen inadvertently or not, Attorney-General v. Canter, 17 A.T.C. 888 (C.A.).

Construction as a whole.—It is a cardinal principle of construction that one should look at the whole of an Act and not merely a particular section or part of a section, In re Ratansi Kalyanji, 2 Bom. 148, and this is necessary even when the words are quite plain. "It is beyond doubt too that we are entitled and indeed bound, when construing the terms of any provisions found in a statute, to consider any other parts of the Act which throw light upon the intention of the Legislature, and which may serve to show that the particular provision ought not to be construed as it would be if considered alone and apart from the rest of the Act", per Lord Herschell in Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490; see also Queen v. Special Commissioners (Ex parte Cape Copper Mining Co.), 2 Tax Cases 332, on appeal 2 Tax Cases 347 and Special Commissioners v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53; Attorney-General v. Excter Corporation, 5 Tax Cases 632.

If the legislature is dealing expressly with any subject-matter, one is bound by what it has said; Sinclair v. Cadbury Bros., 18 Tax Cases 164, but it may be justifiable to refer to the history of the subject-matter as embodied in statutes, Grant v. Langston, 4 Tax Cases 217. General Words in one part of a section or Act have therefore to be construed with reference to all that is in the Act, McKenna v. Eaton Turner, 20 Tax Cases 598. One should therefore ascertain the main object of the Act and construe doubtful passages so as to effectuate that object and not contradict it. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting, 3 Tax Cases 108.

At the same time it is not usual to construe a clause in an Act, as if controlled by a previous clause, Lord Advocate v. Hugh Gibb, 5 Tax Cases 194. It is the later clause, if anything, that should control the earlier clause.

A statute ought to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence or word shall be superfluous, Yorkshire, etc., Co. v. Clayton, 1 Tax Cases 482, or void or insignificant, R. v. Bishop of Oxford, 4 Q.B.D. 245; Grant v. Langston, 4 Tax Cases 217. But surplusage and tautology are not unknown, Special Commissioners for Income-tax v. Pemsel, supra. Words are sometimes inserted in an Act ex abundante cautela; then the Act must be interpreted accordingly. Exceptions are often introduced to quiet the fears of those whose interests are threatened, and who are apprehensive that they may not fall within a general exemption; there may be thus cases in which expressio unius will not be exclusio alterius. Special Commissioner for Income-tax v. Pemsel, supra. A provision, put in possibly ex majore cautela in one section, does not affect the interpretation to be put on a subsequent section if the language of the latter in itself is clear, Furtado v. City of London Brewery, 6 Tax Cases 382.

As between two rival constructions, one of which, without adding any words to the statute, provides a perfectly reasonable and intelligible result, without depriving any subject of any benefit of alleviation of taxation, save only an obviously unintended and unexpected alleviation while the other not only involves the assumption of words ('if any') not in the statute, and on such assumption, deprives, for no apparent reason, the subject of a benefit enjoyed for many years the former is to be preferred, Union Cold Storage Co. v. Simpson Eng. (1939) 2 All. Reports 94 (C.A.). Where more than one construction is possible, the more reasonable and practical one should be followed, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Mahaliram Ramjidas, 1940 I.T.R. 442 (P.C.).

In certain circumstances the principle of "contemporary exposition," may be invoked, Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 1 I.T.C. 284; 51 Cal. 504 and Maharajadhiraj of Dharbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1 I.T.C. 303; 3 Patna 470. It is seldom useful, however, to try to interpret one statute by another. Garland v. Archershee, 15 Tax Cases 734.

Also every attempt should be made to avoid inconsistency of meaning. Sugden v. Leeds Corporation, 6 Tax Cases 211; Colquhoun v. Heddon, 2 Tax Cases 621; Governors of Sutton's Hospital v. Elliott, 8 Tax Cases 155; Grant v. Langston, 4 Tax Cases 217, but if this is impossible the latter passage in the Act must be held to override the earlier, Ajudhia Prasad v. Balmukund, 8 All. 354; Wood v. Riley, (1867) L.R. 3 C.P. 26. A particular enactment should be construed strictly as against a general provision, Churchill v. Crease, (1828) 5 Bing. 177; De Winton v. Brecon Corporation, (1859) 26 Beav. 533.

Proviso.—A proviso or saving clause or exception prevails over the substantive part which it follows, Attorney-General v. Chelsea Waterworks, (1731) Fitzgibbon, p. 195. If a proviso is unnecessarily inserted, in order to except a case which does not fall within the enactment, and only in order to remove misapprehension, it cannot be inferred from this that cases otherwise outside the enactment would fall within it, as they have not been specifically excepted. West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, (1897) A.C. 647. Though a proviso may be used as a guide in selecting one or other of two possible constructions of the enactment if that is ambiguous, it cannot be used by mere implication to import into the enacting part, which is unambiguous, words which are not there, West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, (1897) A.C. 647.

If a section specifically grants exemption to certain persons or bodies of persons, it does not necessarily follow that every other person is brought within the scope of the impost; other persons not specifically referred to may also be exempt. This is not a case to which the principle expressio unius est exclusio alterius can be applied as a matter of course, Special Commissioners of Income-tax v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53. See also Umar Baksh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 402 and notes under section 4 (3) (i) and (ii).

Uniformity of Construction.—A universal law, like Income-tax, cannot receive different interpretations with reference to different localities, Special Commissioners of Income-tax v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53; see also Umar Baksh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 402 and notes under section 4. (3) (i) and (ii). It was held in the Pemsel case that if statutes apply to more than one country (e.g., England and Scotland), "you must reason by analogy, you must take the meaning of legal expressions from the law of the country to which they properly belong, and in any case arising in the sister country, you must apply the statute in an analogous and corresponding sense, so as to make its operation and effect the same in both the countries."

Retrospective effect.—There is no vested right in procedure and alterations in procedure may be interpreted retrospectively; but a right of appeal is a matter of substance and cannot be presumed retrospectively by an alteration in a statute, in the absence of clear terms, Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving, (1905) A.C. 369; Delhi Cloth and General Mills v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Lah. 284 (P.C.); Sheik Atar-ur-Rahman v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1934) I.T.R. 339.

Where there has been a change in the law, and the new law does not provide to the contrary, it is the making of the assessment and the date thereof that determines the applicability of the new law whether in respect of liability or of rate or of exemptions and reliefs, even though the income earned in an earlier year is the material out of which the assessment is made, Jattu Shah Nattu Shah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, A.I.R. 1932 Lah. 575; Commissioner of Income-tax v. Sind Hindu Permanent Funds, 1940 I.T.R. 467; Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Maharaja of Pithapuram, 1942 I.T.R. 1.

It is only when an amending section avoids transactions that express words are necessary to create retrospective effect. Banerjee v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1941 I.T.R. 137.

Consolidating Statutes.—A codifying, or consolidating measure, should be construed as far as possible with reference to its natural meaning, as it stands, without reference to the previous state of the law; otherwise the very object of the codification, viz., the avoidance of reference to previous enactments would be defeated. But a reference to the previous law would be justified if the new measure was ambiguous, Roger Pyat Shellac Co. v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 363; Administrator-General v. Prem Lall Mullick, 22 Cal. 788 (P.C.); see Bank of England v. Vagliano Bros., (1891) A.C. 107, 144; Norendranath Sircar v. Kamal Basini Dasi, 23 Cal. 563 (P.C.). If the same words are used in a consolidating Act as in the original Act, and if the words in the original Act have been judicially interpreted that interpretation should be followed in construing the consolidating Act also, Stewart v. Conservators of River Thames, 5 Tax Cases 297. "Since that decision (Cook v. Knott, 2 T.C. 246) the rule has been re-enacted in the same terms, and I should hesitate long before overruling a decision which has stood for 38 years and upon which subsequent legislation may have been based," per Cave, L.C., in Ricketts v. Colquhoun, 10 Tax Cases 118. Ordinarily, a consolidating Act introduces no changes except of words and arrangement, but if the change in words makes a change in the meaning on ordinary principles of construction, it will be necessary to give effect to the change, see per Lord Sumner in Clare and Heyworth v. Betts, (1927) A.C. 443; 11 Tax Cases 469.

As regards alterations in law or language, the Legislature must not be taken to intend any change beyond what it explicitly declares in express terms or by unmistakable implication, Chief Commissioner of Income-tax v. Zemindar of Singampati, 1 I.T.C. 181; 45 Mad. 518. "If the language used in the amending Act is reasonably capable of being construed so as to leave the procedure substantially as it was, we ought, in my opinion, so to construe it."—R. v. Bloomsbury Commissioners: Ex parte Hooper, (1915) 3 K.B. 768, 769; 7 Tax Cases 69. But the presumption that a change of language necessarily indicates a change of intention, ought not to have too great weight attached to it, Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 1 I.T.C. 284; 51 Cal. 504. There are such things as attempts at a more graceful style and the elimination of superfluous words. It should however be assumed that in re-enacting a particular clause or section, the Legislature was aware of the construction put by Courts on it, Stewart v. Conservators of River Thames, 5 Tax Cases 279, and the amendments must be construed with reference to the state of the law that it was proposed to amend, Attorney-General v. London County Council, 4 Tax Cases 265; Corporation of Birmingham v. Barnes, 12 A.T.C. 358.

Remedial sections—Construction of.—A remedial enactment or section should be construed liberally, Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Wilson, 1 Tax Cases 185; Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees, 6 Tax Cases 590, 604, and a penal one strictly, Perumal v. Municipal Commissioners of Madras, 23 Mad. 164. In construing an exemption clause, no word which would extend the exemption may be left out, nor is generalisation permissible for the purpose of holding one word to be synonymous with another, if in fair construction, it is capable of receiving an independent signification, Muat v. Stewart, 2 Tax Cases 607. A privilege or exemption ought always to be taken into account whether assessment is made under one part of a tax Act or another part of the same Act, Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (C.A.), 53 T.L.R. 258; In re North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Ltd., (1937) I.T.R. 349 (Cal.). The plain words of a remedial statute must not be restricted by interpretation to the removal of the particular mischief which led to the enactment, Corporation of Birmingham v. Barnes, 19 Tax Cases 216. An act by which the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts is taken away should be construed strictly, Prosunno Coomar Paul Chowdhury v. Koylash Chunder Paul Chowdhry, B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 759. Limitation should also be construed strictly, i.e., in favour of the person whose right is the subject of limitation, Manekji v. Rustomji, 14 Bom. 269. Though appeals are the creation of statutory enactment and must be affirmatively given and not presumed, Reg. v. Vajiram, 16 Bom. 414; Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving, (1905) A.C. 369; Rangoon Botataung Co. v. Collector of Rangoon, (1912) 39 I.A. 197, a party should not be deprived of the right of appeal, except by express words or necessary implication, Ranee Shurno Mayce v. IachmEEPput Doogur, B.L.R. Supp. Vol. 694, and if the words of a section giving a right of appeal are ambiguous, they ought to receive a liberal construction, i.e., as far as possible, so as to give an appeal, Zain-ul-Abdin Khan v. Ahmad Khan, 2 All. 67. A statute must not be so construed as to take away benefits already conferred by previous legislation unless that intention is plainly expressed. It cannot be inferred from ambiguous language, Union Cold Storage Co. v. Simpson, (1939) 2 All. Eng. Rep. 94 (C.A.). If a case can be brought under either of two provisions the assessee is entitled to be brought under the (to him) more favourable of the two, Bosotto Bros. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 41.

While a statute imposing a duty should be construed strictly, this can only be in respect of the liability imposed; the principle cannot be extended to mere matters of procedure devised as the best means in all ordinary circumstances to collect the impost. On the general principle of avoiding injustice and absurdity, any construction should be rejected, if escape from it were possible, which enabled a person to defeat a statute or impair his obligations by his own act or otherwise profit by his own wrong, Cowan v. Wright, (1887) 18 Q.B.D. 201, 204; Gopalasami Chettiar v. Secretary of State for India, (1933) I.T.R. 289.

Rules.—The rules made in pursuance of a delegated authority must be consistent with the statute under which the rules are made. The authority is given to the end that the provisions of a statute may be the better carried into effect, and not with the view of neutralising or contradicting these provisions, Rajam Chetti v. Seshayya, 18 Mad. 236, 245. When a power to make regulations is given by statute, no regulations made under it can abridge a right conferred by the statute itself, Queen v. Bird and others: Ex parte Needles, (1898) 2 Q.B. 340. Delegated power may not be further delegated without express provision to that effect, Reg. v. Merian Chetti, 17 Mad. 118.

If there is a conflict between two rules or between a rule and a section of the Act, the position must be dealt with exactly as in the case of a conflict between two sections; and if no reconciliation is possible, the rule would ordinarily be treated as the subordinate provision and made to give way to the section, Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, (1894) A.C. 347; Minister of Health v. The King, (1931) A.C. 494; In re North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Ltd., (1937) I.T.R. 349 (Cal.).

Where the statute is only permissible and allows alternatives, and a rule has been made of a mandatory nature giving no alternative, the Crown cannot fall back on the Act and seek an alternative not allowed by the rule, Lakshmi Insurance Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 24 (Lah.).

In rules, forms and notifications issued under the Act, words shall have the same meaning as in the Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context. (Section 20, General Clauses Act.)

The rules under the Income-tax Act are primarily rules for the guidance of fiscal officers, and not quite of the nature of rules of procedure of Civil Courts. They should therefore be interpreted according to their plain meaning and not stretched by judicial interpretation, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Ellis Reid, 55 Bom. 312, per Barlee, J., at p. 321. See also per Kennedy, J., in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gribble, (1913) 3 K.B. 212 and per Sankey, J., in Neville Reid & Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 545.

Under section 21 of the General Clauses Act, the power to make rules includes the power to add to, amend, vary or rescind orders, rules and notifications.

Machinery sections.—In interpreting a section in a taxing Act relating to the machinery of assessment and not imposing a charge on the subject, that construction should be preferred which makes the machinery workable—ut res valeat potius quam pereat, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Mahaliram Ramjidas, 1940 I.T.R. 442 (P.C.).

Practice.—Special importance is attached to practice—i.e., the interpretation placed by the Revenue authorities—in respect of fiscal law, Special Commissioners v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53; Commissioner of Income-tax

v. Ramanathan Chetti, 43 Mad. 75; 1 I.T.C. 37; Madras Provincial Co-operative Bank v. Commissioner of Income-tax, (1933) I.T.R. 165; Shrimathi Lakshmi Daiji v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1944 I.T.R. 309; but this is done usually when the practice is in favour of the subject. But there is no obligation to pay tax—not clearly and expressly imposed by the law—even though the tax may have been paid by mistake for a long time, Pole Carew v. Craddock, 7 Tax Cases 488. Nor is the practice of the Revenue authorities binding on the Courts one way or the other, Killing Valley Tea Co. v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 54; 48 Cal. 161; Associated Newspapers v. City of London Corporation, (1916) 2 A.C. 429; Chunamal Saligram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, A.I.R. 1931 Lah. 320. Nor could a Court give effect to a practice not warranted by the provisions of the Statute, Glensloy Co. v. Lethem, 6 Tax Cases 453. No weight will be given unless the practice is of long standing, Bhikanpur Sugar Concern Case, 1 I.T.C. 29.

Miscellaneous.—Affirmative words without a negative, expressed or implied, do not take away an existing right, Collector of Trichinopoly v. Lekamani, 14 B.L.R. 115, and an enactment conferring a narrow and limited right, does not take away a larger right, if it exists apart from the enactment; but it has the effect if the apparent intention of the legislature is that the two rights should not exist together, per Lord Cranworth, L.C., in O'Flaherty v. M'Dowell, (1857) 6 H.L.C. 142=10 E.R. 1248; Kinu Ram Das v. Mozaffar Hosain Shaha, 14 Cal. 809.

The following general principles also should be followed: General provisions do not derogate from special provisions, but the latter derogate from the former. In the absence of express legislative directions, the Courts should be guided by justice, equity and good conscience. Every statute should be interpreted so as not to conflict with the comity of nations and accepted principles of International Law.

Besides these, there are various well-known maxims of interpretation, e.g., expressio unius est exclusio alterius, stare decisis, contemporanea expositio, etc., of varying degrees of importance in practical application; and for an exposition of these principles the reader is referred to any treatise on the Interpretation of Statutes.

Question of law.—The proper construction of a statute is a question of law, Great Western Railway v. Bater, 8 Tax Cases 244 (H.L.). Or to put it in another way, judicial interpretation when of general application is a question of law, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Livingston and others, 11 Tax Cases 545.

TAXING ACT—CONSTRUCTION OF.

The rules of construction of Taxing Acts are set out in the following leading cases:—

"If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free however apparently within the spirit of the case he might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute," per Lord Cairns in Partington v. Attorney-General, (1869) L.R. 4 E. & I. App. H.L. 100, p. 122.

"I quite agree we ought not to put a strained construction upon that section in order to make liable to taxation that which would not otherwise be liable, but I think it is now settled that in construing these Revenue Acts, as well as other Acts, we ought to give a fair and reasonable construction, and not to lean in favour of one side or the other, on the ground that it is a tax imposed upon the subject, and therefore, ought not to be forced unless it comes clearly within the words. That is the rule which has been laid down by the House of Lords in regard to the Succession Duty Acts, and I think it is a correct rule," per Cotton, L. J., in Gilbertson v. Fergusson, (1881) 7 Q.B.D. 562, p. 572, 1 Tax Cases 501.

"No tax can be imposed on the subject without words in an Act of Parliament clearly showing an intention to lay a burden on him. But when that intention is sufficiently shown, it is, I think, vain to speculate on what would be the fairest and most equitable mode of levying that tax. The object of those framing a Taxing Act is to grant to Her Majesty a revenue; no doubt they would prefer, if it were possible, to raise that revenue equally from all, and, as that cannot be done, to raise it from those on whom the tax falls with as little trouble and annoyance and as equally as can be contrived; and when any enactments for the purpose can bear two interpretations, it is reasonable to put that construction on them which will produce these effects. But the object is to grant a revenue at all events, even though a possible nearer approximation to equality may be sacrificed in order more easily and certainly to raise that revenue, and I think the only safe rule is to look at the words of the enactments and see what is the intention expressed by those words," per Lord Blackburn, in Coltress Iron Co. v. Black, (1881) 6 App. Cases 315, p. 330, 1 Tax Cases 287.

"This is an Income-tax Act, and what is intended to be taxed is income. And when I say 'what is intended to be taxed,' I mean, what is the intention of the Act as expressed in its provisions, because in a Taxing Act it is impossible, I believe, to assume any intention, any governing purpose in the Act, to do more than take such tax as the statute imposes. In various cases, the principle of construction of a Taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe that may be all reduced to this, that inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a Taxing Act is intended to attain, other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed. Cases, therefore, under the Taxing Acts always resolve themselves into a question whether or not the words of the Act have reached the alleged subject of taxation," per Lord Wensleydale in In re Micklethwait, (1885) 11 Ex. 452 at p. 456.

"It is a well-established rule that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose; and also, that every Act of Parliament must be read according to the natural construction of its words," per Lord Wensleydale in 11 Ex. 456 quoted with approval by Lord Halsbury, L.C., in Tennant v. Smith, (1892) A.C. 150 at p. 154, 3 Tax Cases 158.

"I am rather disposed to repudiate the notion of there being any artificial distinction between the rules to be applied to a taxing Act and the rules to be applied to any other Act. With regard to all Acts and all documents you have to apply your best mind to it to look at the question all round, get all the light that you can throw on it and see what seems to be the meaning of the expressions used. It would not be satisfactory to say that, if this Act applies to anything else than taxation, you might require a less degree of certainty or an inferior exercise of the process of reasoning to attempt to arrive at its meaning, than you should apply in respect to a Tax Act", per Willis, J., in Styles v. Treasurer of Middle Temple, 4 Tax Cases 123.

"I see no reason why special canons of construction should be applied to any Act of Parliament and I know of no authority for saying that a taxing Act is to be construed differently from any other Act. The duty of the Court is, in my opinion, in all cases the same, whether the Act to be construed relates to taxation or any other subject, viz., to give effect to the intention of the Legislature, as the intention is to be gathered from the language employed having regard to the context in connection with which it is employed. The Court must no doubt ascertain the subject-matter to which the particular tax is by the statute intended to be applied but when once this is ascertained it is not open to the Court to narrow or whittle down the operation of the Act by seeming considerations of hardship or of business convenience or the like. Courts have to give effect to what the Legislature has said," per Lord Russell, C.J., in Attorney-General v. Carlton Bank, (1899) 2 Q.B. 158, 164.

"No tax can be imposed except by words which are clear; and the benefit of the doubt is the right of the subject," per Fitzgibbon, L.J., in In re Finance Act, 1894 and Studdert, (1900) 2 Ir. R. p. 400; see also Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Phra Phraison Salarak, 6 Rang. 598; In re Harkishandas, A.I.R. 1931 All. 401.

"I know of no law which prevents a man from avoiding a duty which has not attached to the property. . . . A man is perfectly entitled, if he can, to avoid the payment of duty by disposing of his property in any way not forbidden by the Act. The argument that his motive is to escape duty appears to me wholly irrelevant, because a man is perfectly justified in avoiding and escaping the duty which will arise in the future but which has not yet attached to any property which he possesses," per Farwell, L.J. in Attorney-General v. Richmond & Gordon, (1908) 2 K.B. 729, 743.

In taxation matters, one cannot go into the merits of the dispute but has to apply the relevant statutes to the facts of the case, Kelly v. Rogers, 19 Tax Cases 699, without regard to considerations of equity or Lordship, see Whimster & Co. v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 824; Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts, 13 Tax Cases 434; and Kleman v. Winckworth, 17 Tax Cases 572.

"The Crown however must make out its right to the duty, and if there be a means of evading the stamp duty, so much the better for those who can evade it. It is no fraud upon the Crown, it is a thing which they are perfectly entitled to do," per Lord Esher, M.R., in Commissioners, Inland Revenue v. Angus, 23 Q.B. 579, 593.

Any one is entitled to conduct his affairs within the law so as to avoid incidence of taxation, In re Central Talkies Circuit, 1941 I.T.R. 44 (Bom.).

"Arguments based upon the ground of injustice have but little weight in determining the true meaning of an Act of Parliament unless indeed its provisions are so ambiguous that the hardship inflicted by one construction can be based to show that such a purpose could not be properly attributed to the Legislature" per Lord Buckmaster in Wankie Colliery v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1 A.T.C. 125.

"I think however that considerations of justice and injustice have not much to do with modern direct taxation; they belong to a different order of ideas. Taxation is concerned with expediency or in expediency. It regularly results in one person being burdened for another's benefit in the sense that the subject who pays the tax may be the last person to benefit by the expenditure of it" per Lord Sumner in ibid.

"Equity and Income-tax are strangers," per Lord Sands in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Granite City Steamship Co., 6 A.T.C. 678.

"I agree that this case was not contemplated, but when one gets cases under the taxing law which cannot be contemplated it does not do to make assumptions as to what they would have said had they contemplated the case. I think you have simply to look and see what they have said"—per Rowlatt, J., in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Ryde Pier Co., 4 A.T.C. 513.

"Statutory language cannot be construed by asking which construction will most benefit the Revenue"—per Lord Sumner in National Provident Institution v. Brown, 8 Tax Cases 57.

"But even in a Taxing Statute it is legitimate to consider which of two possible constructions is more in accordance with the spirit and intention of the Act"—per Lord Salvesen in Scottish Shire Line v. Lethem, 6 Tax Cases 91.

Substance is to be looked at in Revenue matters, not machinery and form. St. Louis Breweries v. Aphorpe, 4 Tax Cases 111. See also the following cases: Oriental Bank Corporation v. Wright, (1880) 5 A.C. 842; Cox v. Rabbits, (1878) 3 A.C. 473; Lord Advocate v. Fleming, (1897) A.C. 145; Pryce v. Monmouthshire, etc., Companies, (1879) 4 A.C. 197; Simms v. Registrar of Probates, (1900) A.C. 323; Stockton Railway Co. v. Barrette, (1844) 11 Cl. & Fin. 590.

The above cases were reviewed in the Duke of Westminster's Case, 19 Tax Cases 490 (H.L.). " . . . it is said that in revenue cases there is a doctrine that the Court may ignore the legal position and regard what is called the substance of the matter . . . this supposed doctrine . . . seems to rest for its support on a misunderstanding of the language used in some earlier cases. The sooner this misunderstanding is dispelled and the supposed doctrine given its quietus, the better it will be for all concerned, for the doctrine seems to involve substituting 'the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion' for the golden and straight meted wand of the law" per Lord Tomlin, ibid. Similar observations were made by the Privy Council in Bank of Chettinad v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 522. "The doctrine (of substance as against form) has in the past been invoked for the purpose of treating a transaction of one legal character as though it were a transaction of a different legal character, and in so far as that doctrine was enumerated, certain observations with regard to it are to be found in the speeches in the Duke of Westminster's case. But the method of approach to this problem, which appears to me to be the correct one, does not fall within any discredited portion of that, old doctrine but falls within its permissible limits, because it does not involve putting upon a transaction between parties a character which in law it does not possess. It involves discovering what is the true character in law of the transaction which was entered into" per the Master of Rolls in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Mollabey Deeley, 17 A.T.C. 503 (C.A.).

A strict interpretation may prohibit the importation of any extraneous matter into any statutory enactment but will not justify the elimination or subtraction of any material ingredients from it. If a plain word carries a plain sense in the English language, however strict the law may interpret it, it will not ignore the ordinary meanings which it carries, Madan Mohanlal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1935) I.T.R. 438.

The technicalities of a taxing statute should be strained, if at all in favour of the subject and not against him, Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Beharilall Ramchandra, (1937) I.T.R. 417 (Oudh). In case of doubt, a fiscal law should be interpreted in favour of the subject. Beharilal Bhargava v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., (1941) I.T.R. 9 (All.). See also Stockton & Darlington Railway v. Barrett, (1844) 11 Cl. & F. 590 and Pryce v. Browne, 2 B. & Ad. 43.

"Where it is desired to impose a new burden by way of taxation, it is essential that this intention should be stated in plain terms. The Courts cannot assent to the view that if a section in a taxing statute is of doubtful and ambiguous meaning, it is possible out of the ambiguity to extract a new and added obligation not formerly cast upon the taxpayer," per Lord Buckmaster in Smith and Co. v. Greenwood, 8 Tax Cases 193 cited by Chatterjee, J., in Rogers Pyatt Shellack Company v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 363.

"In construing a fiscal statute the Court has no concern with disputable questions of distributive justice—this upon the plainest ground, that by very strong presumption the Legislature has not intended that questions of equality or fairness in taxation should be left to any decision save its own", per Rankin, C.J., in Emperor v. Probbhat Chandra Baru, 1 I.T.C. 284; 51 Cal. 504 at page 508.

Manifest mistakes.—Although, in construing fiscal enactments, Courts should ordinarily insist upon the subject taxed being clearly within the words of the law and decline to extend its scope when there is any ambiguity, they cannot exclude from their consideration the fact that the context discloses a manifest inaccuracy. In such cases, the sound rule of construction is to eliminate the inaccuracy and to execute the true intention of the Legislature, Jennings v. President, Municipal Commission, 11 Mad. 253.

Double taxation—Presumption against.—In the United Kingdom it is now a well-recognised principle that the various taxing Acts do not authosize the Crown to take income-tax twice over in respect of the same source for the same period of time and that this can be done only under specific statutory authority. As Lord Sumner said in Bradbury v. English Sewing Cotton Co., Ltd., 8 Tax Cases 481. "Though the Acts nowhere say so, this principle has long been assumed. Whether the contention may ever be raised that the Crown is not bound by mere conventions of fair play current from time to time, hitherto, at any rate, the binding force of this principle has not been questioned." A construction resulting in double taxation of the same income would require the support of very clear words to that effect, In re John & Co., 43 All. 139. See also Manindra Chandra Nandi v. Secretary of State, 34 Cal. 257; Emperor v. Probhat Chandra, 1 I.T.C. 284; 61 Cal. 504 in both of which the issue was somewhat different, viz., whether the Indian Income-tax Act specifically authorized the levy of tax on incomes that may have already borne some other tax.

Precedents—Use of.—As to the use of decided cases Halsbury, L.C., said in Quinn v. Leatham, (1901) Appeal Cases 495 (506):—

"There are two observations which I wish to make, and one is that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found. The other is that a case is an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it."

At the same time precedents are not to be lightly departed from—

"We have not, however, succeeded in laying down a rule which would be consistent with the existing legislation and decisions on the subject, and would at the same time be capable of being satisfactorily worked and we are strongly impressed with the importance of not unsettling the law as established by past decisions when we cannot lay down a rule that is not open to exception".—Per Blackburn, J., in (1863) 4 B. & S. 135-146, quoted with approval by Lord Macnaghten in The General Accident, etc., Corporation v. McGowan, 5 Tax Cases 308; [1908] A.C. 207.

"Statements, however, contained in a judgment which go beyond the occasion and lay down a rule which is unnecessary for the purpose in hand have no binding authority," In re Mahaliram Ranjidas, (1938) I.T.R. 265 (Cal.).

English decisions—Applicability of.—Though Income-tax has been in force in India for quite a long time, it is only in the last thirty years or so that the tax has been sufficiently heavy or administered with sufficient strictness to result in disputes. The case-law on the subject has, however, been growing rapidly in recent years. In deciding many problems, Indian Courts have still sometimes to find guidance in precedents in the United Kingdom. Though in North Anantapur Gold Mines v. Chief Commissioner of Income-tax, 1 I.T.C. 133; 44 Mad. 718, and in other cases High Courts considered that the Income-tax law in the United Kingdom may be usefully followed where the provisions are similar, the precedents have had to be applied with great caution, in view of the wide differences between the United Kingdom and the Indian law. This has been stressed by the Privy Council, who "would discard altogether the case-law which has been so painfully evolved in the construction of the English Income-tax Statutes.

... The Indian Act is not in pari materia; it is less elaborate in many ways, subject to fewer refinements; and in arrangement and language, it differs greatly from the provisions which the Courts (in the United Kingdom) have to deal . . . under such conditions . . . little can be gained by attempting to reason from one to the other, at all events (when) the solution of the problem lies very near the surface of the Act and depends mainly on general considerations," Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Shaw Wallace & Co., Ltd., 5 I.T.C. 211.

To the same effect were their observations in Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 60 Cal. 1029; Pondicherry Railway Company, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 54 Mad. 691; Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Fletcher, (1937) I.T.R. 428; Gopal Saran v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, (1935) I.T.R. 237 and Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Mehta, (1938) I.T.R. 521. See also In re Indian Iron & Steel Co., Ltd., (1941) I.T.R. 539 (Cal.). In respect of certain general concepts, however, in regard to which the statute is silent in both countries, e.g., the distinction between income and capital, the test of what constitutes a business or a profession, the criterion of what constitutes expenditure necessary for earning the income, ignoring the destination of the income, etc., the case-law as evolved in the United Kingdom furnishes some useful guidance. English judgments can therefore be utilised as aids in interpreting analogous provisions in the Indian law, though not as binding authorities on these matters where the language of the two Acts differs, In re Amritsar Produce Exchange, Ltd., (1937) I.T.R. 307. Though caution is necessary in applying decisions in a British Income-tax Act to the Indian Income-tax Act, reasoning in British rulings to the extent that it is of a general nature and is not affected by the specialities of the British Act can be applied to elucidate the Indian Act. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Mahaliram Ramjidas, (1940) I.T.R. 442 (P.C.). English decisions have no binding authority on the construction of the Indian Act, and though they may sometimes afford help or guidance, cannot relieve the Indian Courts from their responsibility of applying the language of the Act to the particular circumstances that emerge under conditions of Indian life, All India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, (1944) I.T.R. 482 (P.C.).

Even in respect of such general concepts, e.g., in regard to the relevancy of the locality where income accrues or arises as a basis of liability to tax there are substantial differences between the law in this country and in the United Kingdom. It will be seen—to take an outstanding example—from the decision of the Madras High Court in the Madras Export Company Case, 1 I.T.C. 194 and from the decisions of the Calcutta High Court in the Rogers Pyatt Shellac Case, 1 I.T.C. 363 and of the Rangoon High Court in the Steel Bros. Case, I.L.R. 3 Rang. 614, that there is considerable difficulty in following United Kingdom precedents, even in respect of seemingly similar provisions. See also the observations of the Privy Council in C. B. Mehta's Case referred to above, (1938) I.T.R. 521.

The Indian Income-tax Act being in the English language, the words used in it, should according to the Madras High Court be given the same meaning as in similar statutes in the United Kingdom, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Jamal Muhammad, (1941) I.T.R. 375.

The machinery of assessment and collection is also quite different in the United Kingdom and in India. In the United Kingdom the law attempts to utilise non-official agencies to a considerable extent in assessments, but this is almost a formality in many respects as will be seen from the following extract from the Report of the Royal Commission on Income-tax in 1920:—

“This smooth working of the machine has been rendered possible only by considerable deviations from the scheme . . . originally conceived . . . little by little (the) plan has been departed from . . . and every change has been in the direction of making over to the Inspector of Taxes the exercise of powers that theoretically belong to the Local Commissioners and their officials. Many of the recommendations that we have to make . . . are directed towards recognising and giving legal sanction to these . . . developments. . . .”

PREVIOUS STATUTE—EFFECT OF—EXEMPTIONS.

The question how far the Indian Income-tax Act overrides exemptions from taxation, conferred by previous statutes has arisen in respect of permanently settled estates. The revenue payable by these estates was settled permanently about the year 1800 in accordance with the policy that then prevailed. These estates are mostly in Bengal, Bihar and parts of Assam, and the Northern Circars of Madras; and there are also some 'islands' of permanently settled tracts—some of them fairly extensive—even in the ryotwari parts of Madras. Later on, the policy of the East India Company changed and permanent settlements were not extended elsewhere. The question has often been raised, how far the permanent settlement precluded the levy of further taxation. In some of the Income-tax Acts that preceded the Act of 1886, permanently settled estates were taxed. All agricultural income was taxed and no distinction was made between permanently and temporarily settled estates. From 1877 however, agricultural income was not taxed and both classes of estates escaped taxation. But additional cesses and imposts for various purposes, road cess, education cess, embankment and drainage cess, cost of settlements between landlords and tenants, etc., have since been levied on the permanently settled estates; and though all these levies have evoked protests, the legislature has never admitted that the permanent settlement gave absolute immunity from future taxation. In Manindra Chandra Nandi v. Secretary of State for India, (1907) 34 Cal. 257, it was contended before the High Court of Calcutta that income from royalties on coal in permanently settled lands, should be exempted both from local cesses and from Income-tax. Curiously, however, the objection then taken to the levy of the latter was not that it contravened the permanent settlement, but that royalties were of the nature of capital receipts and that, in any case, the same income should not be taxed twice over, once to local cesses and once to Income-tax. The levy of Income-tax on the non-agricultural income of permanently settled estates was not objected to as a breach of the terms of the permanent settlement.

In later years, however, the question was raised in several cases. In Chief Commissioner of Income-tax v. Zemindar of Singampatti, 1 I.T.C. 181, a Full Bench of the Madras High Court (Ayling, Coutts-Trotter and Ramesam, JJ.) decided that the non-agricultural income of permanently settled estates was not taxable. In Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 1 I.T.C. 284, a Divisional Bench of the Calcutta High Court (Rankin and Page, JJ.) decided that it was. There was a difference of opinion between the two judges and the view of the senior judge (Rankin, J.) prevailed. In Maharajahwaj of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1 I.T.C. 303, the Patna High Court (Dawson Miller, C.J. and Mullick, J.) held that the income was not taxable. Here again the judges differed and the view of the Chief Justice prevailed. In Indu Bhushan Sarkar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 221, a Divisional Bench of the Calcutta High Court (Cuming and Page, JJ.) differed from the ruling in the Barua case and held that the income was not taxable. In Emperor v. Probbhat Chandra Barua, 54 Cal. 863, a Full Bench of five judges of the Calcutta High Court considered the question and (by a majority of three judges, Ghose, Buckland and Panton, JJ., to two, Mukherjee and Suhrawardy, JJ.) decided that the income was taxable. The question was finally set at rest in the same case, (57 I.A. 228) by the Privy Council, who held that while the permanent settlement regulations contained assurances against any claim to the increase of the Jama based on increase in Zemindari income, they contained no promise that the Zemindar, in respect of income derived from the Zemindari, would be exempt from any liability in any future general scheme of property taxation or that the income of the Zemindar would not be subjected along with other incomes, to any future general taxation of incomes, 57 I.A. 228.

The question of applying the rule of construction laid down in Seward v. Vera Cruz (1884) 10 App. Cas. 59, that general words in a later statute should not be held to repeal earlier legislation on a particular matter can arise only if both pieces of legislation deal with the same subject-matter. Regulation 1 of 1793 relates to the jama of each estate while the Bihar Agricultural Income-tax Act deals with a tax on agricultural income. The question of derogation, therefore, does not arise, Hulas Narain Singh v. Behar, (1942) I.T.R. 115 (F.C.).

There is no analogy, however, between the position of a proprietor of a permanently settled estate who has entered into a permanent agreement with Government and that of a conquered Raja who is deposed and reduced to the position of a tenure-holder, Radha Mohun v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 453.

By a treaty of 1803, a landholder (Raja) undertook, inter alia, to pay a tribute to the Government who stated in return that "no further demand, however small, shall be made on the said Raja or received from him as nazar, supplies or otherwise." The question arose whether Income-tax could be levied on the non-agricultural part of the Raja's income and was answered in the affirmative. The Income-tax Act imposes a tax on all persons in British India without exception and must, therefore, be deemed, by necessary implication, to have repealed all earlier exemptions. If there be any earlier legislation or a treaty between the sovereign power and the subject for special exemption from future taxation, followed by the introduction by the sovereign power, at a later date, of legislation which, admittedly, but for the claim to the earlier exemption, applies to and includes the person originally exempted, it follows that, by necessary implication, the later statute repeals the earlier statute or other Act under which the exemption is claimed. A repeal by implication is effected when the provisions of a later enactment are so inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of an earlier one that the two cannot stand together, Rajendra Narayan Bhanja Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., (1937) I.T.R. 111.

United Kingdom Law.—Section 213 of the United Kingdom Income-tax Act, 1918, lays down that no letters patent granted by the Crown of any exemption from tax and no statute granting payments free of tax can exempt a person from tax, but Parliament can by legislation subsequent to a general taxing Act confer exemption from that Act, Argyll (Duke of) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 Tax Cases 225. Where a statute confers exemption from taxes, the exemption prima facie applies only to taxes in existence at the time of passing of the statute. Associated Newspapers, Ltd. v. London Corporation, (1916) 2 A.C. 429; but if the terms of exemption are wide enough, it may apply also to future taxes including income-tax, Pole Carew v. Craddock, (1920) 3 K.B. 109; 7 Tax Cases 488 (C.A.).

In the Ancholme Drainage Act, 1767, it was laid down that "all taxes, tolls, rates and duties to be raised by virtue of the Act shall at all times hereafter be exempted from the payment of any taxes, rates, assessments or impositions whatsoever, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." It was held that the exemption applied to Income-tax also and was not confined to local taxes only. There was no reason to limit the generality of the words of the Act and there was nothing in the context to justify such a course, Ancholme Drainage Commissioners v. Weldhen, 20 Tax Cases 241; (1936) 1 All. E.R. 759. In Sinclair v. Cadbury Bros., 18 T.C. 156, land which was exempt from all taxes by a Statute 1660, was used for business purposes and it was held that for the purposes of income-tax the annual value of the land should be deducted from the profit of the trade in the usual course as otherwise the exemption would be nullified.

A statute must not be so construed as to take away benefits already conferred by previous legislation, unless the intention to do so is plainly expressed. Such intention cannot be inferred from ambiguous language, Union Cold Storage Co. v. Simpson, (1939) 2 All. Eng. Rep. 94 (C.A.).

In a colonial case, United Towns Electric Co. v. Attorney-General of Newfoundland, 18 A.T.C. 294 (P.C.), the company was by an Act liable for "water rates" but exempt from all other taxation, and it was contended by the Crown unsuccessfully that the exemption must be confined on the principle of eiusdem generis to taxation of the type of water rates, i.e., to local taxation as distinguished from Provincial or Federal taxation.

INCOME-TAX LEGISLATION—THEORY OF—INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS.

"It is the principle of domicile that regulates the levy of Income-tax . . . This is certainly the rule in most of the systems and that it should be so is perhaps to some extent accounted for by the fact that attempts to levy and to collect Income-tax in a foreign country would very frequently encounter insurmountable difficulties"—Bar's International Law quoted by Seshagiri Iyer, J., in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Ramanathan Chetti, 43 Mad. 75. The 'domicile' refers to persons as well as property or business; otherwise it is difficult to see how the above extract represents the same view as in the following extract from Wharton's Conflict of Laws, Vol. I, which also the learned judge quoted as stating the same view:—

"The power of taxation of any State is, of necessity, limited to persons, property or business within its territorial jurisdiction . . . the principle is so fundamental that it has been declared that an act of State legislature in violation thereof would be as much a nullity as if in conflict with the most explicit constitutional inhibition."

It is obvious that a tax cannot be enforced unless either the country is the place of 'origin' of the income, i.e., there is a source of income there, whether tangible or not, or the country is the place of 'domicile' of the 'tax-payer', i.e., he resides in the country. ('Domicile' is not used in a legal but in an economic sense.) Otherwise the country has no means of imposing taxation. The principles of 'domicile' and 'origin' are applied in varying degrees by different countries. Though the principles are clear enough when stated in the abstract, they are exceedingly difficult of application in practice, as it is not easy to state what is the cause or the source of the income. The result is continual and acute conflict between the fiscal interests of different countries on the one hand and a heavy burden in the shape of double taxation on the tax-payer on the other. Political as well as economic considerations stand in the way of any really satisfactory arrangements being made between different countries. The problem is more difficult and obscure than jurists have generally assumed it to be, as will be seen from the voluminous literature produced on the subject under the auspices of the League of Nations.

THE POSITION OF THE CROWN.

It is a maxim in English law that the Crown is not bound by an Act of Parliament unless by express enactment referring to the Crown in unambiguous terms. The Crown, therefore, is not ordinarily within the scope of a Taxing Act. In India, however, the position has been somewhat different. See Bell v. Municipal Commissioners for the City of Madras, 25 Mad. 457, in which Bell, the Superintendent of the Government Gun Carriage Factory, was successfully prosecuted to conviction for failure to pay Municipal licence fees on account of timber belonging to Government.

Per Benson, J.—In England, owing to historical causes, the Legislature has proceeded on the view that the Crown is not bound by a Statute unless named in it, and we, therefore, find that the Crown is, in many Statutes, expressly stated to be bound, but it is impossible to say broadly that in India, the Crown is not bound by a Statute, or the taxing provisions of a Statute, unless expressly named in it. Such express inclusion is altogether exceptional. It would be more correct to say that, as a general rule, the Indian Legislatures have proceeded on the assumption that the Government will be bound by the Statute unless expressly or by necessary implication excluded from its operation. Government, when a party to litigation, pays Court-fees just as other suitors do, because there is no special exemption in favour of Government in the Court-Fees Act. On the other hand, Government is specially exempted from the payment of stamp duties under the General Stamp Act, 1899, section 3, proviso 1, "in cases where but for this exemption the Government would be liable to pay the duty chargeable in respect of such instrument". This amounts to a statutory declaration that Government would be liable to pay the duty but for the special exemption. In like manner, goods belonging to Government are specially exempted from duty under the Sea Customs Act and the Indian Tariff Act, and it would be easy to enumerate many other Acts in which exemptions are made in favour of Government on the evident assumption, that but for such exemption the Government would be bound, 25 Mad. 466.

Per Bhashyam Aiyangar, J.—But it is unduly stretching the language of the rule, to bring within its scope general words of a Statute imposing a tax and claim exemption for the Crown on the ground that the Crown is divested of any prerogative right, title or interest by giving full effect to the general words.

So far as exemption from any tax imposed by a Statute is concerned, the question for determination is whether according to the right construction of the Statute, the Crown is or is not made liable to pay the tax. In the former case, it is bound to pay; in the latter, it is not; in neither case is there any question of prerogative. The rule of construction above adverted to, cannot itself be regarded as a prerogative of the Crown. A Statute imposing a tax upon Crown property, which tax will be payable out of the public revenues, cannot reasonably be regarded as divesting the Crown of any right, title or interest, within the meaning of the above rules—especially when such tax is levied for purposes connected with the good government of the country, for which purpose, such revenues are, in India, vested in trust in the Crown, by section 39 of 21 and 22 Vict., chap. 106.

The conclusions I come to, are—(i) The canon of interpretation of Statutes, that the prerogative or rights of the Crown cannot be taken away except by express words or necessary implication, is as applicable to the Statutes passed by the Indian Legislatures as to Parliamentary and Colonial Statutes; and this is really concluded by the authority of the Privy Council in more appeals than one from the Colonies;

(ii) When in an Indian Act, the Crown is not expressly included and the question is whether it is bound by necessary implication, the course of Indian Legislation and Acts in pari materia with the Act in question will have an important bearing upon the construction of the Act;

(iii) Notwithstanding that in several Indian enactments the Crown has been specially exempted, the above rule of interpretation will nevertheless hold good in construing the provisions of an enactment from the operation of which the Crown is not expressly exempted, when a question is raised as to whether such provisions take away a right, or prerogative of the Crown;

(iv) The said rule, based like other cognate rules of construction upon the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant is not really a prerogative of the Crown, though such rule as well as the rule relating to the construction of Crown-grants are dealt with in treatises under the head of "Prerogatives of the Crown" and also loosely referred to as such in some English decisions;

(v) The English law as to the exemption of the Crown and Crown property from payment of tolls, poor-rates and other taxes, local or imperial, imposed by Statutes rests partly upon historical reasons and principally upon judicial decisions which do not proceed upon a course of reasoning or principle which will be binding on Indian Courts;

(vi) Exemption from payment of tolls, rates and taxes is not in reality a prerogative of the Crown, but depends solely upon the right construction to be put upon the Crown-grant or the Statute in question;

* * * * *

(ix) According to the uniform course of Indian Legislation, Statutes imposing duties or taxes bind Government as much as its subjects, unless the very nature of the duty or tax is such as to be inapplicable to Government, and whenever it is the intention of the Legislature to exempt Government from any duty or tax which in its nature is not inapplicable to Government, the Government is specially exempted, Bell v. Municipal Commissioners, 25 Mad. 457 at pp. 500-502.

(The exemption of Government goods from customs duties was repealed on 1st April, 1924, and Government goods pay duty from that date.)

Similarly in Australia it has been held, in King v. Sutton, (1908) 5 C.L.R. 789, that the exemption of the Crown from taxation, in the absence of express provision to that effect applies to the Crown only in its capacity as the Executive Government of the country whose statutes are in question. It was accordingly held that the Federal Customs Act applied to the Crown in its character as the Executive Government of New South Wales, and that goods imported by the Government of New South Wales were liable accordingly to customs duties imposed by the Federal Government.

Under the Government Trading Taxation Act III of 1926, every trade or business carried on by or on behalf of the Government of any part of His Majesty's Dominions, exclusive of British India, can be taxed in British India as though the business were that of a 'Company'. Similarly the other Dominions are entitled under their statutes, if any, to tax the profits of any business carried on in those Dominions by or on behalf of the Government of India. This reciprocal arrangement which was arrived at in the Imperial Economic Conference in 1923, was designed to remove the handicaps against private trade that the previous exemption from taxation of State undertakings had created. Under the above Act, 'His Majesty's Dominions' include territories under His Majesty's protection or in respect of which a mandate is being exercised by the Government of any part of His Majesty's Dominions. Therefore, under the above Act the profits of business carried on by Indian States in British India become taxable. The above Act does not apply to States outside the British Empire as they are not parties to the arrangement.

An important change in the position was made by section 155 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which runs as follows:

"155. (1) Subject as hereinafter provided the Government of a Province and the Ruler of a Federated State shall not be liable to Federal taxation in respect of lands or buildings situate in British India or income accruing, arising or received in British India:

Provided that—

(a) where a trade or business of any kind is carried on by or on behalf of the Government of a Province in any part of British India outside that Province or by a Ruler in any part of British India, nothing in this sub-section shall exempt that Government or Ruler from any Federal taxation in respect of that trade or business, or any operations connected therewith, or any income arising in connection therewith, or any property occupied for the purposes thereof;

(b) nothing in this sub-section shall exempt a Ruler from any Federal taxation in respect of any lands, buildings or income being his personal property or personal income.

(2) Nothing in this Act affects any exemption from taxation enjoyed as of right at the passing of this Act by the Ruler of an Indian State in respect of any Indian Government securities issued before that date."

FOREIGN STATES—LIABILITY.

The Government Trading Taxation Act above referred to applies only to Dominions in the British Empire. The liability of a foreign State, that is to say, a State outside the British Empire, is therefore to be determined by other considerations. Broadly speaking, the liability to taxation depends largely on the same considerations as determine the liability of a foreign State to be sued in the Municipal Courts of the country. This is a difficult question of international law on which there appears to be difference of opinion. One school of jurists appears to think that if a foreign Government trades in this country, it is certainly liable to tax, though it will not be possible to enforce the liability, if the foreign State refuses voluntarily to discharge the liability; while another school seems to think that there is no liability to taxation at all. But from the fact that in regard to the British Dominions themselves the Legislature found it necessary to make an express provision as to the liability in the shape of the Government Trading Taxation Act, it must be presumed that in the absence of such legislation no liability would have attached to the British Dominions carrying on trade in India. In the same way, it would seem that we should assume that there is no liability in respect of trading carried on by foreign States. If it is intended to impose such a liability, what will presumably be done is for the Government of India to enter into an agreement with the foreign State concerned and then introduce the necessary legislation.

In either view—whether a foreign State is liable or not—it would seem that a foreign Government cannot be assessed at all, inasmuch as section 3 of the Income-tax Act refers (apart from Hindu undivided families) only to 'individuals', 'firms', 'companies' and 'associations of persons', and presumably a foreign Government is none of these. It also does not seem possible to make the local agent or agents of the foreign Government liable for the tax under sections 42 and 43 of the Act, inasmuch as these agents are presumably entitled to the same immunity from processes as the foreign Governments whom they represent.

(3) The aggregate of any sums exempted under this section shall not, together with any sums exempted under the second proviso to sub-section (1) of section 7, and any sums exempted under sub-section (1) of section 58-F, exceed in the case of an individual, one-sixth of the total income of the assessee, or six thousand rupees, whichever is less, and in the case of a Hindu undivided family, one-sixth of the total income of the assessee, or twelve thousand rupees, whichever is less.

Payment by deduction at source.

Provided that such person may, at the time of making any deduction, increase or reduce the amount to be deducted under this sub-section for the purpose of adjusting any excess or deficiency arising out of any previous deduction or failure to deduct.

(2-A) Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, for the purpose of making the deduction under sub-section (2), there shall be included in the amount payable any income chargeable under the head 'Salaries' which is payable to the assessee out of India by or on behalf of the Crown, and the value in rupees of such income shall be calculated at the prescribed rate of exchange.

(2-B) Any person responsible for paying any income chargeable under the head "Salaries" to a person not resident in British India shall at the time of payment deduct income-tax at the maximum rate and also super-tax at the rate or rates applicable to the estimated income of the assessee under this head.

(3) The person responsible for paying any income chargeable under the head "Interest on securities" shall, unless otherwise prescribed in the case of any security of the Central Government, at the time of payment, deduct income-tax but not super-tax on the amount of the interest payable at the maximum rate:

Provided that where the Income-tax Officer gives a certificate in writing (which certificate he shall give in every proper case on the application of the assessee) that to the best of his belief the total income or the total world income of a recipient will be less than the minimum liable to income-tax or will be liable to a rate of income-tax less than the maximum rate, the person responsible for paying any income referred to in this sub-section or in sub-section (2-B), as the case may be, to such recipient shall, until such certificate is cancelled by the Income-tax Officer, pay the income without deduction or deduct the tax at such less rate, as the case may be.

(3-A) Any person responsible for paying to a person not resident in British India any interest not being "Interest on securities", or any other sum chargeable under the provisions of this Act, shall, at the time of payment, unless he is himself liable to pay income-tax thereon as an agent, deduct income-tax at the maximum rate.

Provided that where the person so payable is a British subject as defined in section 27 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, or a subject of a State in India or Burma, and the Income-tax Officer gives a certificate in writing (which certificate he shall give in every proper case on the application of the assessee) that to the best of his belief the total world income of such person will be less than the minimum liable to income-tax or that his total income will be liable to a rate of income-tax less than the maximum rate, the person responsible for paying any income referred to in this sub-section shall, until such certificate is cancelled by the Income-tax Officer, pay the income without deduction or deduct the tax at such less rate as the case may be:

Provided further that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to any payment made in the course of transactions in respect of which the person responsible for making the payment is deemed under the first proviso to section 43 not to be an agent of the payee.

(3-B) Where the Income-tax Officer has reason to believe that the total world income of any person residing out of British India to whom any interest not being "Interest on securities" or any other sum chargeable under this Act is payable, will in any year exceed the maximum amount which is not chargeable with super-tax under the law for the time being in force, he may, by order in writing, require the person responsible for making such payments to such person to deduct at the time of payment super-tax at the rates determined by the Income-tax Officer to be applicable to the total world income of such person in that year.

(3-C) Where the person responsible for paying any interest not being "Interest on securities" or any other sum chargeable under this Act to any person makes to that person in any year payments exceeding in the aggregate the maximum amount which is not chargeable with super-tax under the law for the time being in force, the person responsible for making such payments shall, if he has not reason to believe that the recipient is resident in British India, and no order under sub-section (3-B) has been received in respect of such recipient, deduct at the time of payment super-tax on the amount by which the total amount of such payments exceeds the maximum amount not chargeable with super-tax at the rate applicable to such excess.

(3-E) If in any year the amount of any dividend or the aggregate amount of any dividends paid to any shareholder by a company increased in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 16 exceeds the maximum amount of the total income of a person which is not chargeable to super-tax under the law for the time being in force, and the principal officer of the company has no reason to believe that the shareholder is resident in British India, and no order under sub-section (3-D) has been received in respect of such shareholder by the principal officer from the Income-tax Officer, the principal officer shall at the time of payment deduct super-tax on the amount of such excess at the rate which would be applicable under the law for the time being in force if the amount of such dividend or dividends increased as aforesaid constituted the whole total income of the shareholder.

(4) All sums deducted in accordance with the provisions of this section shall, for the purpose of computing the income of an assessee, be deemed to be income received.

(5) Any deduction made in accordance with the provisions of this section and any sum by which a dividend has been increased under sub-section (2) of section 16 shall be treated as a payment of income-tax or super-tax on behalf of the person from whose income the deduction was made, or of the owner of the security or of the shareholder, as the case may be, and credit shall be given to him therefor in the assessment, if any, made for the following year under this Act:

Provided that, if such person or such owner obtains, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, a refund of any portion of the tax so deducted, no credit shall be given for the amount of such refund:

Provided further that where such person or owner is a person whose income is included under the provisions of clause (c) of sub-section (1) or sub-section (3) of section 16, section 44-D or section 44-E in the total income of another person such other person shall be deemed to be the person or owner on whose behalf payment has been made and to whom credit shall be given in the assessment for the following year.

(6) All sums deducted in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be paid within the prescribed time by the person making the deduction to the credit of the Central Government, or as the Central Board of Revenue directs.

(7) If any such person does not deduct or after deducting fails to pay the tax as required by or under this section, he, and in the cases specified in sub-sections (3-D) and (3-E) the company of which he is the principal officer shall, without prejudice to any other consequences which he or it may incur, be deemed to be an assessee in default in respect of the tax:

Provided that the Income-tax Officer shall not make a direction under sub-section (1) of section 46 for the recovery of any penalty from such person unless satisfied that such person has wilfully failed to deduct and pay the tax.

(8) The power to levy by deduction under this section shall be without prejudice to any other mode of recovery.

(9) Every person deducting income-tax or super-tax in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (3), (3-A), (3-B), (3-C), (3-D) or (3-E) shall, at the time of payment of the sum from which tax has been deducted, furnish to the person to whom such payment is made a certificate to the effect that income-tax or super-tax has been deducted, and specifying the amount so deducted, the rate at which the tax has been deducted, and such other particulars as may be prescribed.

Advance payment of tax.

come-tax at the time of payment, the Income-tax Officer may, on or after the 1st day of April in any financial year, by order in writing, require an assessee to pay quarterly to the credit of the Central Government on the 15th day of June, 15th day of September, 15th day of December, and 15th day of March in that year respectively, an amount equal to one-quarter of the income-tax and super-tax payable on so much of such income as is included in his total income of the latest previous year in respect of which he has been assessed, if that total income exceeded six thousand rupees. Such income-tax and super-tax shall be calculated at the rates in force for the financial year in which he is required to pay the tax, and shall bear to the total amount of income-tax and super-tax so calculated on the said total income the same proportion as the amount of such inclusions bears to his total income or, in cases where under the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 17 both income-tax and super-tax or super-tax are chargeable with reference to the total world income, shall bear to the total amount of income-tax and super-tax which would have been payable on his total world income of the said previous year had it been his total income the same proportion as the amount of such inclusions bears to his total world income:

Provided that, where the previous year of the assessee in respect of any source of income ends after the 31st day of December and before the 30th day of April, the order in writing issued by the Income-tax Officer requiring the payment of income-tax and super-tax on that source of income shall substitute for the four quarterly payments hereinbefore specified, three payments of equal amounts to be made on the 15th day of September, the 15th day of December and 15th day of March, respectively:

Provided further that, if the assessee is a partner of a registered firm and an assessment of the firm has been completed for a previous year later than that for which the assessee's last assessment has been completed, his share in the profits of the firm shall, for the purposes of this sub-section, be included in his total income on the basis of the latest assessment of the firm:

Provided further that, if after the making of an order by the Income-tax Officer and before the 15th day of February of the financial year an assessment of the assessee or of the registered firm of which he is a partner is completed in respect of a previous year later than that referred to in the order of the Income-tax Officer, the Income-tax Officer may make an amended order requiring the assessee to pay in one instalment on the specified date, or in equal instalments on the specified dates if more than one, falling after the date of the amended order, the tax computed on the revised basis as reduced by the amount, if any, paid in accordance with the original order; but if the amount already paid exceeds the tax determined on the revised basis, the excess shall be refunded:

(b) If the notice of demand issued under section 29 in pursuance of the order under clause (a) of this sub-section is served after any of the dates on which the instalments specified therein are payable, the tax shall be payable in equal instalments on each of such of those dates as fall after the date of the service of the notice of demand, or in one sum on the 15th day of March if the notice is served after the 15th day of December.

(2) If any assessee who is required to pay tax by an order under sub-section (1) estimates at any time before the last instalment is due that the part of his income to which that sub-section applies for the period which would be the previous year for an assessment for the year next following is less than the income on which he is required to pay tax and accordingly wishes to pay an amount less than the amount which he is so required to pay, he may send to the Income-tax Officer an estimate of the tax payable by him calculated in the manner laid down in sub-section (1) on that part of his income for such period, and shall pay such amount as accords with his estimate in equal instalments on such of the dates specified in sub-section (1) (a) as have not expired or in one sum if only the last of such dates has not expired:

Provided that the assessee may send a revised estimate of the tax payable by him before any one of the dates specified in sub-section (1) (a) and adjust any excess or deficiency in respect of any instalment already paid in a subsequent instalment or in subsequent instalments.

(3) Any person who has not hitherto been assessed shall, before the 15th day of March, in each financial year, if his total income of the period which would be the previous year for an assessment for the financial year next following is likely to exceed six thousand rupees, send to the Income-tax Officer an estimate of the tax payable by him on that part of his income to which the provisions of section 18 do not apply of the said previous year calculated in the manner laid down in sub-section (1), and shall pay the amount, on such of the dates specified in that sub-section as have not expired, by instalments which may be revised according to the proviso to sub-section (2).

(4) Where part of the income to which sub-section (1), (2) or (3) applies consists of any income of the nature of commission which is receivable periodically and is not received or adjusted by the payer in the assessee's account before any of the quarterly instalments of tax become due, he may defer payment of tax on that part of his income to the date on which such income would be normally received or adjusted and if he does so he shall communicate to the Income-tax Officer the date to which such payment is deferred:

Provided that, if the tax of which the payment is deferred is not paid within fifteen days of the date on which such income or part thereof is received or adjusted by the payer in the assessee's account, the tax shall be payable with six per cent. simple interest per annum from the date of such receipt or adjustment to the date of payment of the tax.

(5) The Central Government shall pay on any amount paid under this section simple interest at two per cent. per annum from the date of payment to the date of the assessment (hereinafter called the 'regular assessment') made under section 23 of the income, profits and gains of the previous year for an assessment for the year next following the year in which the amount was payable:

Provided that on any portion of such amount which is refunded under the foregoing provisions of this section interest shall be payable only up to the date on which the refund was made.

(6) Where in any year an assessee has paid tax under sub-section (2) or sub-section (3) on the basis of his own estimate, and the tax so paid is less than eighty per cent. of the tax determined on the basis of the regular assessment, so far as such tax relates to income to which the provisions of section 18 do not apply and so far as it is not due to variations in the rates of tax made by the Finance Act enacted for the year for which the regular assessment is made, simple interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January in the financial year in which the tax was paid up to the date of the said regular assessment shall be payable by the assessee upon the amount by which the tax so paid falls short of the said eighty per cent;

Provided that, where, as a result of an appeal under section 31 or section 33 or of a revision under section 33-A or of a reference to the High Court under section 66, the amount on which interest was payable under this sub-section has been reduced the interest shall be reduced accordingly and the excess interest paid, if any, shall be refunded together with the amount of income-tax that is refundable:

Provided further that, where a business, profession or vocation is newly set up and is assessable on the income, profits and gains of its first previous year in the financial year following that in which it is set up, the interest payable shall be computed from the 1st day of April of the said financial year.

(7) Where, on making the regular assessment, the Income-tax Officer finds that any assessee has:—

(a) under sub-section (2) or sub-section (3) underestimated the tax payable by him and thereby reduced the amount payable in any of the first three instalments, or

(b) under sub-section (4) wrongly deferred the payment of tax on a part of his income, he may direct that the assessee shall pay simple interest at six per cent. per annum, in the case referred to in clause (a) for the period during which the payment was deficient on the difference between the amount paid in each such instalment and the amount which should have been paid having regard to the aggregate tax actually paid under this section during the year, and in the case referred to in clause (b) for the period during which the payment of tax was wrongly deferred on the amount which the payment was so deferred:

Provided that for the purposes of this sub-section any instalment due before the expiry of six months from the commencement of the previous year in respect of which it is to be paid shall be deemed to have become due fifteen days after the expiry of the said six months.

(8) Where, on making the regular assessment, the Income-tax Officer finds that no payment of tax has been made in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this section, interest calculated in the manner laid down in sub-section (6) shall be added to the tax as determined on the basis of the regular assessment.

(9) If the Income-tax Officer, in the course of any proceedings in connection with the regular assessment, is satisfied that any assessee:—

(a) has furnished under sub-section (2) or sub-section (3) estimates of the tax payable by him which he knew or had reason to believe to be untrue, or

(b) has without reasonable cause failed to comply with the provisions of sub-section (3), the assessee shall be deemed, in the case referred to in clause (a), to have deliberately furnished inaccurate particulars of his income, and in the case referred to in clause (b), to have failed to furnish the return of his total income; and the provisions of section 28, so far as may be, shall apply accordingly:

Provided that the amount of penalty leviable shall, in the case referred to in clause (a), be a sum not exceeding one-and-a-half times the amount by which the tax actually paid during the year under the provisions of this section falls short of the tax that should have been paid by the assessee under sub-section (1) or eighty per cent. of the tax determined on the basis of the regular assessment as modified in the manner provided in sub-section (6), whichever is the less, and, in the case referred to in clause (b), one-and-a-half times the said eighty per cent.

(10) (a) If any assessee does not pay on the specified dates any instalment of tax that he is required to pay under sub-section (1) and does not, before the date on which any such instalment as is not paid becomes due send under sub-section (2) an estimate or a revised estimate of the tax payable by him, he shall be deemed to be an assessee in default in respect of such instalment or instalments.

(b) If any assessee has sent under sub-section (2) or sub-section (3) an estimate or a revised estimate of the tax payable by him, but does not pay any instalment in accordance therewith on the date or dates specified in sub-section (1), he shall be deemed to be an assessee in default in respect of such instalment or instalments:

Provided that the assessee shall not, under clause (a) or (b), be deemed to be in default in respect of any amount of which the payment is deferred under sub-section (4) until after the date communicated by him to the Income-tax Officer under that sub-section.

(11) Any sum other than a penalty or interest paid by or recovered from an assessee in pursuance of the provisions of this section shall be treated as a payment of tax in respect of the income of the period which would be the previous year for an assessment for the financial year next following the year in which it was payable, and credit therefor shall be given to the assessee in the regular assessment.

19. In the case of income in respect of which provision is not made under section 18 for deduction of income-tax at the time of payment, and in any case where income-tax has not been deducted in accordance with the provisions of section 18, income-tax shall be payable by the assessee direct.

19-A. The principal officer of every company shall, on or before the 15th day of June in each year, furnish to the prescribed officer a return in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner of the names and of the addresses, as entered in the register of shareholders maintained by the company, of the shareholders to whom a dividend or aggregate dividends exceeding such amount as may be prescribed in this behalf has or have been distributed during the preceding year and of the amount so distributed to each such shareholder.

20. The principal officer of every company shall, at the time of distribution of dividends, furnish to every person receiving a dividend a certificate to the effect that the company has paid or will pay income-tax on the profits which are being distributed and specifying such other particulars as may be prescribed.

20-A. The person responsible for paying any interest not being "interest on securities" shall, on or before the fifteenth day of June in each year, furnish to the prescribed officer a return in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner of the names and addresses of all persons to whom during the previous financial year he has paid interest or aggregate interest exceeding such amount not being less than four hundred rupees as may be prescribed in this behalf, together with the amount paid to each such person.

21. The prescribed person in the case of every Government office, and the principal officer or the prescribed person in the case of every local authority, company or other public body or association, and every private employer shall prepare, and, within thirty days from the 31st day of March in each year, deliver or cause to be delivered to the Income-tax Officer in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner, a return in writing showing—

(a) the name and, so far as it is known, the address, of every person who was receiving on the said 31st day of March, or has received or to whom was due during the year ending on that date, from the authority, company, body, association or private employer, as the case may be, any income chargeable under the head "Salaries" of such amount as may be prescribed;

(b) the amount of the income so received or so due by each such person, and the time or times at which the same was paid or due, as the case may be;

(c) the amount deducted in respect of income-tax and super-tax from the income of each such person.

22. (1) The Income-tax Officer shall, on or before the 1st day of May in each year, give notice by publication in the press and by publication in the prescribed manner, requiring every person whose total income during the previous year exceeded the maximum amount which is not chargeable to income-tax to furnish, within such period not being less than sixty days as may be specified in the notice, a return, in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner, setting forth (along with such other particulars as may be required by the notice) his total income and total world income during that year:

Provided that the Income-tax Officer may in his discretion extend the date for the delivery of the return in the case of any person or class of persons.

(2) In the case of any person whose total income is, in the Income-tax Officer's opinion, of such an amount as to render such person liable to income-tax, the Income-tax Officer may serve a notice upon him requiring him to furnish, within such period, not being less than thirty days, as may be specified in the notice, a return in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner setting forth (along with such other particulars as may be provided for in the notice) his total income and total world income during the previous year:

Provided that the Income-tax Officer may in his discretion extend the date for the delivery of the return.

(3) If any person has not furnished a return within the time allowed by or under sub-section (1) or sub-section (2), or having furnished a return under either of those sub-sections, discovers any omission or wrong statement therein, he may furnish a return or a revised return, as the case may be, at any time before the assessment is made.

(4) The Income-tax Officer may serve on any person who has made a return under sub-section (1) or upon whom a notice has been served under sub-section (2) a notice requiring him, on a date to be therein specified, to produce, or cause to be produced, such accounts or documents as the Income-tax Officer may require:

Provided that the Income-tax Officer shall not require the production of any accounts relating to a period more than three years prior to the previous year.

(5) The prescribed form of the returns referred to in sub-sections (1) and (2) shall, in the case of an assessee engaged in any business, profession or vocation, require him to furnish particulars of the location and style of the principal place wherein he carries on the business, profession or vocation and of any branches thereof, the names and addresses of his partners, if any, in such business, profession or vocation and the extent of the share of the assessee and the shares of all such partners in the profits of the business, profession or vocation and any branches thereof.

23. (1) If the Income-tax Officer is satisfied without requiring the presence of the assessee or the production by him of any evidence that a return made under section 22 is correct and complete, he shall assess the total income of the assessee, and shall determine the sum payable by him on the basis of such return.

(2) If the Income-tax Officer is not satisfied without requiring the presence of the person who made the return or the production of evidence that a return made under section 22 is correct and complete, he shall serve on such person a notice requiring him, on a date to be therein specified, either to attend at the Income-tax Officer's office or to produce, or to cause to be there produced, any evidence on which such person may rely in support of the return.

(3) On the day specified in the notice issued under sub-section (2), or as soon afterwards as may be, the Income-tax Officer, after hearing such evidence as such person may produce and such other evidence as the Income-tax Officer may require, on specified points, shall, by an order in writing, assess the total income of the assessee, and determine the sum payable by him on the basis of such assessment.

(4) If any person fails to make the return required by any notice given under sub-section (2) of section 22 and has not made a return or a revised return under sub-section (3) of the same section, or fails to comply with all the terms of a notice issued under sub-section (4) of the same section or, having made a return, fails to comply with all the terms of a notice issued under sub-section (2) of this section, the Income-tax Officer shall make the assessment to the best of his judgment and determine the sum payable by the assessee on the basis of such assessment and, in the case of a firm, may refuse to register it or may cancel its registration if it is already registered:

Provided that the registration of a firm shall not be cancelled until fourteen days have elapsed from the issue of a notice by the Income-tax Officer to the firm intimating his intention to cancel its registration.

(5) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing sub-sections, when the assessee is a firm and the total income of the firm has been assessed under sub-section (1), sub-section (3) or sub-section (4), as the case may be,—

(a) in the case of a registered firm, the sum payable by the firm itself shall not be determined but the total income of each partner of the firm, including therein his share of its income, profits and gains of the previous year, shall be assessed and the sum payable by him on the basis of such assessment shall be determined:

Provided that if such share of any partner is a loss it shall be set off against his other income or carried forward and set off in accordance with the provisions of section 24:

Provided further that when any of such partners is a person not resident in British India, his share of the income, profits and gains of the firm shall be assessed on the firm at the rates which would be applicable if it were assessed on him personally, and the sum so determined as payable shall be paid by the firm; and

(b) in the case of an unregistered firm, the Income-tax Officer may instead of determining the sum payable by the firm itself proceed in the manner laid down in clause (a) as applicable to a registered firm, if, in his opinion, the aggregate amount of the tax including super-tax, if any, payable by the partners under such procedure would be greater than the aggregate amount which would be payable by the firm and the partners individually if the firm were assessed as an unregistered firm.

(6) Whenever the Income-tax Officer makes a determination in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (5), he shall notify to the firm by an order in writing the amount of the total income on which the determination has been based and the apportionment thereof between the several partners.

23-A. (1) Where the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that in respect of any previous year the profits and gains distributed as dividends by any company up to the end of the sixth month after its accounts for that previous year are laid before the company in general meeting are less than sixty per cent. of the assessable income of the company of that previous year, as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof he shall, unless he is satisfied that having regard to losses incurred by the company in earlier years or to the smallness of the profit made, the payment of a dividend or a larger dividend than that declared would be unreasonable, make with the previous approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner an order in writing that the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes and reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof shall be deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders as at the date of the general meeting aforesaid, and thereupon the proportionate share thereof of each shareholder shall be included in the total income of such shareholder for the purpose of assessing his total income:

Provided that when the reserves representing accumulations of past profits which have not been the subject of an order under this sub-section exceed the paid up capital of the company, together with any loan capital which is the property of the shareholders, or the actual cost of the fixed assets of the company whichever of these is greater, this section shall apply as if instead of the words 'sixty per cent. of the assessable income' the words 'one hundred per cent. of the assessable income' were substituted:

Provided further that no order under this sub-section shall be made where the company has distributed not less than fifty-five per cent. of the assessable income of the company as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof unless the company, on receipt of a notice from the Income-tax Officer that he proposes to make such an order, fails to make within three months of the receipt of such notice a further distribution of its profits and gains so that the total distribution made is not less than sixty per cent. of the assessable income of the company of the previous year concerned as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof:

Provided further that this sub-section shall not apply to any company in which the public are substantially interested or to a subsidiary company of such a company if the whole of the share capital of such subsidiary company is held by the parent company or by the nominees thereof.

Explanation.—For the purpose of this sub-section,—a company shall be deemed to be a company in which the public are substantially interested if shares of the company (not being shares entitled to a fixed rate of dividend, whether with or without a further right to participate in profits) carrying not less than twenty-five per cent. of the voting power have been allotted unconditionally to, or acquired unconditionally by and are at the end of the previous year beneficially held by, the public (not including a company to which the provisions of this sub-section apply), and if any such shares have in the course of such previous year been the subject of dealings in any stock exchange in British India or are in fact freely transferable by the holders to other members of the public:

(2) The Inspecting Assistant Commissioner shall not give his approval to any order proposed to be passed by the Income-tax Officer under this section until he has given the company concerned an opportunity of being heard.

(3) * * * * *

(ii) Where the proportionate share of any member of a company in the undistributed profits and gains of the company has been included in his total income under the provisions of sub-section (1), the tax payable in respect thereof shall be recoverable from the company if it cannot be recovered from such member.

(iii) Where tax is recoverable from a company under this sub-section, a notice of demand shall be served upon it in the prescribed form showing the sum so payable, and such company shall be deemed to be the assessee in respect of such sum, for the purposes of Chapter VI.

(4) Where tax has been paid in respect of any undistributed profits and gains of a company under this section, and such profits and gains are subsequently distributed in any year, the proportionate share therein of any member of the company shall be excluded in computing his total income of that year.

(5) When a company is a shareholder deemed under sub-section (1) to have received a dividend, the amount of the dividend thus deemed to have been paid to it shall be deemed to be part of its total income for the purpose also of the application of that sub-section to distributions of profits by that company.

24. (1) Where any assessee sustains a loss of profits or gains in any year under any of the heads mentioned in

Set-off of loss in computing aggregate income. section 6, he shall be entitled to have the amount of the loss set-off against his income, profits or gains under any other head in that year:

Provided that, where the loss sustained is a loss of profits or gains which would but for the loss have accrued or arisen within an Indian State and would, under the provisions of clause (c) of sub-section (2) of section 14, have been exempted from tax such loss shall not be set off except against profits or gains accruing or arising within an Indian State and exempt from tax under the said provisions.

Provided further that where the assessee is an unregistered firm which has not been assessed under the provisions of clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23 in the manner applicable to a registered firm, any such loss shall be set off only against the income, profits and gains of the firm and not against the income, profits and gains of any of the partners of the firm; and where the assessee is a registered firm, any loss which cannot be set off against other income, profits and gains of the firm shall be apportioned between the partners of the firm and they alone shall be entitled to have the amount of the loss set off under this section.

(2) Where any assessee sustains a loss of profits or gains in any year, being a previous year not earlier than the previous year for the assessment for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1940, under the head 'Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation', and the loss cannot be wholly set off under sub-section (1), the portion not so set off shall be carried forward to the following year and set off against the profits and gains, if any, of the assessee from the same business, profession or vocation for that year; and if it cannot be wholly so set off, the amount of loss not so set off shall be carried forward to the following year, and so on; but no loss shall be so carried forward for more than six years, and a loss arising in the previous years for the assessment for the years ending on the 31st day of March, 1940, the 31st day of March, 1941, the 31st day of March, 1942, the 31st day of March, 1943 and the 31st day of March, 1944, respectively, shall be carried forward only for one, two, three, four and five years, respectively:

Provided that—

(a) Where the loss sustained is a loss of profits and gains of a business, profession or vocation to which the first proviso to sub-section (1) is applicable, and the profits and gains of that business, profession or vocation are, under the provisions of clause (c) of section (2) of section (14) exempt from tax such loss shall not be set off except against profits and gains accruing or arising in an Indian State from the same business, profession, or vocation and exempt from tax under the said provisions:

(b) where depreciation allowance is, under clause (b) of the proviso to clause (vi) of sub-section (2) of section 10, also to be carried forward, effect shall first be given to the provisions of this sub-section;

(c) nothing herein contained shall entitle any assessee, being a registered firm, to have carried forward and set off any loss which has been apportioned between the partners, under the proviso to sub-section (1), or entitle any assessee, being a partner in an unregistered firm which has not been assessed under the provisions of clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23 in the manner applicable to a registered firm, to have carried forward and set off against his own income any loss sustained by the firm;

(d) where an unregistered firm, is assessed as a registered firm under clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23, during any year, its losses shall also be carried forward and set off under this section as if it were a registered firm;

(e) where a change has occurred in the constitution of a firm, nothing in this section shall be deemed to entitle the firm to have set off so much of the loss proportionate to the share of a retired or deceased partner computed in accordance with the provisions of clause (b) of sub-section (1)

of section 16 as exceeds his share of profits, if any, of the previous year in the firm, or to entitle any partner to the benefit of any portion of the said loss which is not apportionable to him under the said clause (b), and where any person carrying on any business, profession or vocation has been succeeded in such capacity by another person, otherwise than by inheritance, nothing in this section shall be deemed to entitle any person other than the person incurring the loss to have it set off against his income, profits or gains.

(3) When, in the course of the assessment of the total income of any assessee, it is established that a loss of profits or gains has taken place which he is entitled to have set off under the provisions of this section, the Income-tax Officer shall notify to the assessee by order in writing the amount of the loss as computed by him for the purposes of this section.

24-A. (1) When it appears to the Income-tax Officer that any person may leave British India during the current financial year, or shortly after its expiry, and that he has no present intention of returning, the Income-tax Officer may proceed to assess him on his total income of the period from the expiry of the last previous year of which the income has been assessed in his hands to the probable date of his departure from British India, or where he has not been previously assessed, on his total income of the period up to the probable date of his departure from British India. The assessment shall be made on the total income of each completed previous year included in such period at the rate at which such income would have been charged had it been fully assessed, and as respects the period from the expiry of the last of such completed previous years to the probable date of departure the Income-tax Officer shall estimate the total income of such person during such period and assess it at the rate in force for the financial year in which such assessment is made:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall authorise an Income-tax Officer to assess any income, profits or gains which have escaped assessment or have been under-assessed, or have been assessed at too low a rate, or have been the subject of excessive relief under this Act but in respect of which he is debarred from issuing a notice under section 34.

(2) For the purpose of making an assessment under sub-section (1), the Income-tax Officer may serve a notice upon such person requiring him to furnish, within such time not being less than seven days as may be specified in the notice, a return in the same form and verified in the same manner as a return under sub-section (2) of section 22, setting forth (along with such other particulars as may be provided for in the notice) his total income for each of the completed previous years comprised in the relevant period referred to in the first sentence of sub-section (1) and his estimated total income for the period from the expiry of the last such completed previous year to the probable date of his departure; and the provisions of this Act shall, so far as may be apply as if the notice were a notice issued under sub-section (2) of section 22.

24-B. (1) Where a person dies, his executor, administrator or other legal representative shall be liable to pay out of the estate of the deceased person to the extent to which the estate is capable of meeting the charge the tax assessed as payable by such person, or any tax which would have been payable by him under this Act if he had not died.

(2) Where a person dies before the publication of the notice referred to in sub-section (1) of section 22 or before he is served with a notice under sub-section (2) of section 22 or section 34, as the case may be, his executor, administrator or other legal representative shall, on the serving of the notice under sub-section (2) of section 22 or under section 34, as the case may be, comply therewith, and the Income-tax Officer may proceed to assess the total income of the deceased person as if such executor, administrator or other legal representative were the assessee.

(3) Where a person dies, without having furnished a return which he has been required to furnish under the provisions of section 22, or having furnished a return which the Income-tax Officer has reason to believe to be incorrect or incomplete, the Income-tax Officer may make an assessment of the total income of such person and determine the tax payable by him on the basis of such assessment, and for this purpose may by the issue of the appropriate notice which would have had to be served upon the deceased person had he survived, require from the executor, administrator or other legal representative of the deceased person any accounts, documents or other evidence which he might under the provisions of sections 22 and 23 have required from the deceased person.

25. (1) Where any business, profession or vocation to which sub-section (3) is not applicable is discontinued in any year, an assessment may be made in that year on the basis of the income, profits or gains of the period between the end of the previous year and the date of such discontinuance in addition to the assessment, if any, made on the basis of the income, profits or gains of the previous year.

(2) Any person discontinuing any such business, profession or vocation shall give to the Income-tax Officer notice of such discontinuance within fifteen days thereof, and, where any person fails to give the notice required by this sub-section, the Income-tax Officer may direct that a sum shall be recovered from him by way of penalty not exceeding the amount of tax subsequently assessed on him in respect of any income, profits or gains of the business, profession or vocation up to the date of its discontinuance.

(3) When the profits and gains have been assessed as aforesaid, the Income-tax Officer shall determine the sum payable as tax thereon at the rate for the time being applicable to the total income of a company, and such sum shall be payable by the master of the ship, and a port-clearance shall not be granted to the ship until the Customs-collector, or other officer duly authorised to grant the same, is satisfied that the tax has been duly paid.

(4) For the purposes of this section, an "associated operation" means, in relation to any transfer, an operation of any kind effected by any person in relation to any of the assets transferred or any assets representing whether directly or indirectly any of the assets transferred, or to the income arising from any such assets, or to any assets representing whether directly or indirectly the accumulations of income arising from any such assets.

(5) A person shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have power to enjoy income of a person not resident, or resident but not ordinarily resident, in British India, if—

(9) Where any person has been charged to tax on any income deemed to be his under the provisions of this section, and that income is subsequently received by him, whether as income or in any other form, it shall not again be deemed to form part of his income for the purposes of this Act.

44-E. (1) Where the owner of any securities (in this sub-section and in sub-section (2) referred to as "the owner") agrees to sell or transfer those securities, and by the same or any collateral agreement—

(a) agrees to buy back or re-acquire the securities, or
(b) acquires an option, which he subsequently exercises, to buy back or re-acquire the securities, then, if the result of the transaction is that any interest becoming payable in respect of the securities is receivable otherwise than by the owner, the interest payable as aforesaid shall, whether it would or would not have been chargeable to tax apart from the provisions of this section, be deemed for all the purposes of this Act to be the income of the owner and not to be the income of any other person.

(2) The references in sub-section (1) to buying back or re-acquiring the securities shall be deemed to include references to buying or acquiring similar securities, so, however, that where similar securities are bought or acquired, the owner shall be under no greater liability to tax than he would have been under if the original securities had been bought back or re-acquired.

(6) The Income-tax Officer may by notice in writing require any person to furnish him within such time as he may direct (not being less than twenty-eight days), in respect of all securities of which such person was the owner at any time during the period specified in the notice, such particulars as he considers necessary for the purposes of this section and for the purpose of discovering whether tax has been borne in respect of the interest on all those securities; and, if that person without reasonable excuse fails to comply with the notice, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees and to a further penalty of the like amount for every day after the infliction of such penalty during which the failure continues.

(3) For the purposes of assessment to income-tax or super-tax in the case of any such person, the income from any securities to which this sub-section applies shall be deemed to accrue from day to day, and in the case of the sale or transfer of any such securities by or to him shall be deemed to have been received as and when it is deemed to have accrued:

Provided that this section shall not apply if such person proves to the satisfaction of the Income-tax Officer that the avoidance of income-tax or super-tax was exceptional and not systematic and that there was not in his case in any of the three preceding years any such avoidance of income-tax or super-tax, or that the provisions of section 44-E have been applied in his case in respect of such income.

(4) If any person fails to furnish any statement or particulars required under this section, or if the Income-tax Officer is not satisfied with any statement or particulars furnished under this section, the Income-tax Officer may make an estimate of the amount of the income which, under the foregoing provisions of this section, is to be deemed to form part of the person's total income for the purposes of income-tax or super-tax.

(5) If any person without reasonable excuse fails to furnish any statement or particulars required under this section, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees, and to a further penalty of the like amount for every day after the infliction of such penalty during which the failure continues.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section income shall be deemed to have been brought into British India if it has been utilized or could have been utilized for the purposes of any expenditure actually incurred by the assessee without British India or if the income whether capitalized or not has been brought into British India in any form.

(5) If any assessee is in receipt of any income chargeable under the head "Salaries", the Income-tax Officer may require any person paying the same to deduct from any payment subsequent to the date of such requisition any arrears due from such assessee, and such person shall comply with any such requisition, and shall pay the sums so deducted to the credit of the Central Government, or as the Central Board of Revenue directs.

(6) If the recovery of income-tax in any area has been entrusted to a Provincial Government under section 124 (1) of the Government of India Act, 1935, the Provincial Government may direct with respect to that area or any part thereof, that income-tax shall be recovered therein with, and as an addition to, any municipal tax or local rate, by the same person and in the same manner as the municipal tax or local rate is recovered.

(2) If the rate at which a shareholder is deemed under sub-section (1) to have obtained relief exceeds the rate at which he would have been entitled to relief had such relief been given direct to him by or under the said sections or Order, any excess shall be recovered from him either as an addition to the tax payable by him on any assessment made on him under section 23 or section 34 or by setting it off against any relief due to him under section 48.

(2) If a public servant discloses any particulars contained in any such statement, return, accounts, documents, evidence, affidavit, deposition or record, he shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to six months, and shall also be liable to fine.

(5) No prosecution shall be instituted under this section except with the previous sanction of the Commissioner.

CHAPTER IX.

SUPER-TAX.

55. In addition to the income-tax charged for any year, there shall be charged, levied and paid for that year in respect of the total income of the previous year of any individual, Hindu undivided family, company, local authority, unregistered firm or other association of persons, not being a registered firm, or the partners of the firm or members of the association individually, an additional duty of income-tax (in this Act referred to as super-tax) at the rate or rates laid down for that year by Act of the Central Legislature:

Provided that where under the provisions of clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23 an unregistered firm has been assessed in the manner applicable to a registered firm, super-tax shall be payable by each partner of the firm individually on his share in the income, profits and gains of the firm and not by the firm itself:

Provided further that, where the profits and gains of an unregistered firm or other association of persons not being a company have been assessed to super-tax, super-tax shall not be payable by a partner of the firm or a member of the association, as the case may be, in respect of the amount of such profits and gains which is proportionate to his share.

56. Except in cases to which section 15-A applies or to which by clause (a) of the proviso to sub-section (3) and (4) of section 25, those sub-sections do not apply and subject to the provisions of this Chapter, the total income of any individual, Hindu undivided family, company, local authority, unregistered firm or other association of persons shall, for the purposes of super-tax, be the total income as assessed for the purposes of income-tax, and where an assessment of total income has become final and conclusive for the purposes of income-tax for any year, the assessment shall also be final and conclusive for the purposes of super-tax for the same year.

58. (1) All the provisions of this Act, relating to the charge, assessment, collection and recovery of income-tax except those contained in section 3, the second proviso to sub-section (1) of section 7, the second and third provisos to section 8, clauses (a) and (b) of sub-section (2) of section 14, and sections 15, 15-A, 19 and 20 and the first proviso to sub-section (1) of section 41 and section 58-F and sub-section (2) of section 58-G shall apply, so far as may be, to the charge, assessment, collection and recovery of super-tax.

(2) Save as provided in sub-sections (2), (2-A), (2-B), (3-B), (3-C), (3-D) and (3-E) of section 18, and section 58-H super-tax shall be payable by the assessee direct.

CHAPTER IX-A.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO CERTAIN CLASSES OF PROVIDENT FUNDS.

58-A. In this Chapter, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) a “recognised provident fund” means a provident fund which has been and continues to be recognised by the Commissioner, in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter;

(b) an “employer” means—

(i) a Hindu undivided family, company, firm or other association of persons, or maintaining a provident fund for the benefit of his or its employees;

(c) an “employee” means an employee participating in a provident fund, but does not include a personal or domestic servant;

(d) a “contribution” means any sum credited by or on behalf of any employee out of his salary, or by an employer out of his own monies, to the individual account of an employee, but does not include any sum credited as interest;

(e) the “balance to the credit” of an employee means the total amount to the credit of his individual account in a provident fund at any time;

(f) the “annual accretion” to the balance to the credit of an employee means the increase to such balance in any year, arising from contributions and interest;

(h) the “regulations of a fund” means the special body of regulations governing the constitution and administration of a particular provident fund.

58-B. (1) The Commissioner of Income-tax may accord recognition to any provident fund which, in his opinion, satisfies the conditions prescribed in section 58-C and the rules made thereunder, and may, at any time, withdraw such recognition if, in his opinion, the provident fund contravenes any of those conditions.

(2) An order according recognition shall take effect on such date as the Commissioner may fix in accordance with any rules the Central Board of Revenue may make in this behalf, such date not being later than the last day of the financial year in which the order is made.

(3) An order withdrawing recognition shall take effect from the day on which it is made.

(3-A) An order according recognition to a provident fund shall not, unless the Commissioner otherwise directs, be affected by the fact that the fund is subsequently amalgamated with another provident fund on the occurrence of an amalgamation of the undertakings in connection with which the two funds are maintained, or that it subsequently absorbs the whole or a part of another provident fund belonging to an undertaking which is wholly or in part transferred to or merged in the undertaking of the employer maintaining the first mentioned fund.

(4) An employer objecting to an order of the Commissioner refusing to recognise or on order withdrawing recognition from a provident fund may appeal, within sixty days of such order, to the Central Board of Revenue.

The appeal shall be in the form and shall be verified in the manner prescribed by the Central Board of Revenue.

58-C. (1) In order that a provident fund may receive and retain recognition, it shall satisfy the conditions set out below and any other conditions which the Central Government may, by rule, prescribe—

(a) All employees shall be employed in India, or shall be employed by an employer whose principal place of business is in British India.

Provided that the Commissioner may, if he thinks fit and subject to such conditions, if any, as he thinks proper to attach to the recognition, accord recognition to a fund maintained by an employer whose principal place of business is not in British India notwithstanding that a proportion not exceeding ten per cent. of the employees is employed outside India.

(b) The contributions of an employee in any year shall be a definite proportion of his salary for that year, and shall be deducted by the employer from the employee's salary in that proportion, at each periodical payment of such salary in that year, and credited to the employee's individual account in the fund:

Provided that an employee who retains his employment while serving in His Majesty's Forces or when taken into or employed in the National Service under the National Service (European British Subjects) Act, 1940 or the National Service (Technical Personnel) Ordinance, 1940, may, notwithstanding that he receives from the employer no salary or a salary less than he would have received had he not entered His Majesty's Service, or been so taken into or employed in the National Service contribute to the fund during his service in His Majesty's Forces or while so taken into or employed in the National Service a sum not exceeding the amount he would have contributed had he continued to receive from the employer the same salary (including increments, if any) as he would have received had he not entered His Majesty's Forces or been taken into or employed in the National Service.

(c) Subject to the provisions of section 58-D, the contributions of an employer to the individual account of an employee in any year shall not exceed the amount of the contributions of the employee in that year, and shall be credited to the employee's individual account at intervals not exceeding one year.

(d) The fund shall consist of contributions as above specified, and of donations, if any, received by the trustees, of accumulations thereof, and of interest (simple and compound), credited in respect of such contributions, donations and accumulations, and of securities purchased therewith and of no other sums.

(e) The fund shall be vested in two or more trustees or in the Official Trustee, under a trust which shall not be revocable save with the consent of all the beneficiaries.

(f) The employer shall not be entitled to recover any sum whatsoever from the fund, save in cases where the employee is dismissed for misconduct or voluntarily leaves his employment otherwise than on account of ill-health or other unavoidable cause before the expiration of the term of service specified in this behalf in the regulations of the fund.

In such cases the recoveries made by the employer shall be limited to the contributions made by him to the individual account of the employee, and to interest (simple and compound) credited in respect of such contributions and accumulations thereof, in accordance with the regulations of the fund.

(g) The accumulated balance due to an employee shall be payable on the day he ceases to be an employee of the employer maintaining the fund.

(h) Save as provided in clause (g), or in accordance with such conditions and restrictions as the Central Government may, by rules, prescribe, no portion of the balance to the credit of an employee shall be payable to him.

(2) Where there is a repugnance between any regulation of a recognised provident fund and any provision of this Chapter or of the rules made thereunder, the regulation shall, to the extent of the repugnance, be of no effect.

The Commissioner may, at any time, require that such repugnance shall be removed from the regulations of the fund.

58-D. Subject to any rules which the Central Government may make in this behalf, the Commissioner may, in respect of any particular fund, relax the provisions of condition (c) of sub-section (1) of section 58-C—

Power to relax restrictions of employer's contributions in certain cases.

(a) so as to permit the payment of larger contributions by an employer to the individual accounts of employees whose salary does not exceed five hundred rupees per mensem; and

(b) so as to permit the crediting by employers to the individual accounts of employees of periodical bonuses or other contributions of a contingent nature, where the calculation and payment of such bonuses or other contributions is provided for on definite principles by the regulations of the fund.

58-E. The annual accretion in any year to the balance at the credit of an employee participating in a recognised provident fund shall be deemed to have been received by him in that year and shall be included in his total income for that year, and, subject to the exemptions specified in section 58-F, shall be liable to income-tax and super-tax:

Provided that, for the purpose of sub-section (3) of section 15, out of such annual accretion, only the employee's own contributions shall be included in his total income.

58-F. (1) An employee shall not be liable to pay income-tax on contributions to his individual account in a recognised provident fund, in so far as the aggregate of such contributions in any year does not exceed one-sixth of his salary in that year or six thousand rupees, whichever is less.

(2) Interest credited on the accumulated balance of any employee in a recognised provident fund shall be exempt from payment of income-tax, if and in so far as it does not exceed one-third of the salary of the employee for the year concerned and in so far as it is allowed at a rate not exceeding such rate as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, fix in this behalf.

58-G. (1) Where the accumulated balance due to an employee participating in a recognised provident fund becomes payable, such accumulated balance shall be exempt from payment of super-tax except to the extent of an amount equal to the aggregate of the amounts of super-tax on annual accretions that would have been payable under section 58-E up to the first day of April, 1933, if the Indian Income-tax (Second Amendment) Act, 1933, had come into force on the 15th March, 1930.

(2) Where an employee participating in a recognised provident fund has rendered continuous service with his employer for a period of not less than five years, and the accumulated balance due to him becomes payable, such accumulated balance shall be exempt from payment of income-tax and shall be excluded from the computation of his total income:

Provided that the Commissioner of Income-tax may allow such exemption and exclusion where the employee has rendered continuous service with the employer for a period of less than five years, if, in his opinion, the service has been terminated by reason of the employee's ill-health, or by the contraction or discontinuance of the employer's business, or other cause beyond the control of the employee.

(3) Where exemption from payment of income-tax is not allowed under the provisions of sub-section (2), the Income-tax Officer shall calculate the total of the various sums of income-tax and super-tax which would have been payable by the employee in respect of his total income for each of the years concerned if the fund had not been a recognised provident fund, and the amount by which such total exceeds the total of all sums paid by or on behalf of such employee by way of tax for such years shall be payable by the employee in addition to any other income-tax and super-tax for which he may be liable for the year in which the accumulated balance due to him becomes payable.

58-H. The trustees of a recognised provident fund, or other person authorised by the regulations of the fund to make payment of accumulated balances due to employees, shall, at the time an accumulated balance due to an employee is paid, deduct therefrom any income-tax payable under sub-section (3) of section 58-G and any income-tax and super-tax payable on an employee's total income as determined under sub-section (3) of section 58-J, and sub-sections (4) to (9) of section 18 shall apply as if the sum to be deducted were income-tax payable under the head "Salaries."

58-I. (1) The accounts of a recognised provident fund shall be maintained by the trustees of the fund and shall be in such form and for such periods, and shall contain such particulars as the Central Board of Revenue may prescribe.

(2) The accounts shall be open to inspection at all reasonable times by Income-tax authorities, and the trustees shall furnish to the Income-tax Officer such abstracts thereof as the Central Board of Revenue may prescribe.

58-J. (1) Where recognition is accorded to a provident fund with existing balances, an account shall be made of the fund up to the day before the day on which the recognition takes effect, showing the balance to the credit of each employee on such day, and containing such further particulars as the Central Board of Revenue may prescribe.

(2) The account shall also show in respect of the balance to the credit of each employee the amount thereof which is to be transferred to that employee's account in the recognised provident fund, and such amount (hereinafter called his transferred balance) shall be shown as the balance to his credit in the recognised provident fund on the date on which the recognition of the fund takes effect, and sub-sections (3) and (4) shall apply thereto.

Any portion of the balance to the credit of an employee in the existing fund which is not transferred to the recognised fund shall be excluded from the accounts of the recognised fund and shall be liable to income-tax and super-tax in accordance with the provisions of this Act other than this chapter.

(3) Subject to such rules as the Central Board of Revenue may make in this behalf, the Income-tax Officer shall make a calculation of the aggregate of all sums comprised in a transferred balance which would have been liable to income-tax if this chapter had been in force from the date of the institution of the fund, without regard to any tax which may have been paid on any such sum, and such aggregate (if any) shall be deemed to be income received by the employee in the year in which the recognition of the fund takes effect, and shall be included in the employee's total income for that year; and, for the purposes of assessment, the remainder of the transferred balance shall be disregarded, but no other exemption or relief, by way of refund or otherwise, shall be granted in respect of any sum comprised in such transferred balance.

Provided that, in cases of serious accounting difficulty, the Commissioner shall have power, subject to the said rules, to make a summary calculation of such aggregate.

(4) Notwithstanding anything contained in condition (h) of sub-section (1) of section 58-C, an employee, in order to enable him to pay the amount of tax assessed on his total income as determined under sub-section (3), shall be entitled to withdraw from the balance to his credit in the recognised provident fund a sum not exceeding the difference between such amount and the amount to which he would have been assessed if the transferred balance had not been included in his total income.

(5) Nothing in this section shall affect the rights of the persons administering an unrecognised provident fund or dealing with it, or with the balance to the credit of any individual employee, before recognition is accorded, in any manner which may be lawful.

58-K. (1) Where an employer who maintains a provident fund (whether recognised or not) for the benefit of his employees and has not transferred the fund or any portion of it, transfers such fund or portion to trustees in trust for the employees participating in the fund, the amount so transferred shall be deemed to be of the nature of capital expenditure.

(2) When an employee participating in such fund is paid the accumulated balance due to him therefrom, any portion of such balance as represents his share in the amounts so transferred to the trustee (without addition of interest, and exclusive of the employee's contributions and interest thereon) shall, if the employer has made effective arrangements to secure that tax shall be deducted at source from the amount of such share when paid to the employee, be deemed to be an expenditure by the employer within the meaning of clause (xii) of sub-section (2) of section 10, incurred in the year in which the accumulated balance due to the employee is paid.

58-L. (1) All rules made under this chapter shall be subject to the provisions of sub-sections (4) and (5) of section 59.

(2) In addition to any power conferred by this chapter, the Central Government may make rules:—

(a) prescribing the statements and other information to be submitted with an application for recognition;

(b) limiting the contributions to a recognised provident fund by employees of a company who are shareholders in the company;

(c) providing for the assessment by way of penalty of any consideration received by an employee for an assignment of, or creation of a charge upon, his beneficial interest in a recognised provident fund;

(d) determining the extent to and the manner in which exemption from payment of income-tax and super-tax may be granted in respect of contributions and interest credited to the individual accounts of employees in a provident fund from which recognition has been withdrawn; and

(e) generally, to carry out the purposes of this chapter and to secure such further control over the recognition of provident funds and the administration of recognised provident funds as it may deem requisite.

58-M. This Chapter shall not apply to any provident fund to which the Provident Funds Act, 1925, applies.

Application of this chapter.

CHAPTER IX-B.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO CERTAIN CLASSES OF SUPERANNUATION FUNDS.

Definitions.

58-N. In this Chapter, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) “approved superannuation fund” means a superannuation fund or any part of a superannuation fund which has been and continues to be approved by the Central Board of Revenue in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter;

(b) “employer”, “employee” and “contribution” have, in relation to superannuation funds, the meanings assigned to those expressions in section 58-A in relation to provident funds;

(c) “ordinary annual contribution” means an annual contribution of a fixed amount or an annual contribution computed on some definite basis by reference to the earnings, the contributions or the number of members of the fund.

58-O. (1) The Central Board of Revenue may accord approval to any superannuation fund or any part of a superannuation fund which in its opinion complies with the requirements of section 58-P, and may at any time withdraw such approval, if in its opinion the circumstances of the fund or part cease to warrant the continuance of the approval.

(2) The Central Board of Revenue shall communicate in writing to the trustees of the fund the grant of approval with the date on which the approval is to take effect, and, where the approval is granted subject to conditions, those conditions.

(3) The Central Board of Revenue shall communicate in writing to the trustees of the fund any withdrawal of approval with the reasons for such withdrawal and the date on which the withdrawal is to take effect.

(4) The Central Board of Revenue shall neither refuse nor withdraw approval to any superannuation fund or any part of a superannuation fund unless it has given the trustees of that fund a reasonable opportunity of being heard in the matter.

58-P. In order that a superannuation fund may receive and retain approval the following conditions shall be satisfied, namely:—

(a) the fund shall be a fund established under an irrevocable trust in connection with a trade or undertaking carried on in British India;

(b) the fund shall have for its sole purpose the provision of annuities for employees in the trade or undertaking on their retirement at or after a specified age or on their becoming incapacitated prior to such retirement, or for the widows, children or dependants of persons who are or have been such employees on the death of those persons; and

(c) the employer in the trade or undertaking shall be a contributor to the fund:

Provided that the Central Board of Revenue may, if it thinks fit and subject to such conditions, if any, as it thinks proper to attach to the approval, approve a fund or any part of a fund—

(i) notwithstanding that the rules of the fund provide for the return in certain contingencies of contributions paid to the fund, or

(ii) if the main purpose of the fund is the provision of such annuities as aforesaid, notwithstanding that such provision is not its sole purpose, or

(iii) notwithstanding that the trade or undertaking in connection with which the fund is established is carried on only partly in British India.

58-Q. (1) An application for approval of a superannuation fund or part of a superannuation fund for any year of assessment shall be made in writing before the end of that year by the trustees of the fund to the Income-tax Officer, and shall be accompanied by a copy of the instrument under which the fund is established and by two copies of the rules and of the accounts of the fund for the last year for which such accounts have been made up. The Central Board of Revenue may require such further information to be supplied as it thinks proper.

(2) If any alteration in the rules, constitution, objects or conditions of the fund is made at any time after the date of the application for approval, the trustees of the fund shall forthwith communicate such alteration to the Income-tax Officer, and in default of such communication any approval given shall, unless the Central Board of Revenue otherwise orders, be deemed to have been withdrawn from the date on which the alteration took effect.

58-R. Income derived from investments or deposits of an approved superannuation fund shall be exempt from payment of income-tax, and any sum paid by an employer or an employee by way of contribution towards an approved superannuation fund shall, in the case of an employer, be deducted in computing his income, profits or gains for the purpose of assessment, and, in the case of an employee, be treated for all the purposes of this Act as if it were a sum to which the provisions of section 15 apply:

Provided that no such exemption shall be allowable to an employee in respect of any sum which is not an ordinary annual contribution:

Provided further that where a contribution by an employer is not an ordinary annual contribution it shall, for the purposes of this section, be treated, as the Central Board of Revenue may direct, either as an expense incurred in the year in which the sum is paid, or as an expense to be spread over such period of years as the Central Board of Revenue thinks proper.

58-S. (1) Where any contributions (including interest on contributions, if any) are repaid to an employee, the amount so repaid shall be deemed for the purposes of income-tax to be income of the employee for that year.

(2) Where any contributions (including interest on contributions, if any) are repaid to an employee during his lifetime but not at or in connection with the termination of his employment, income-tax on the amount so repaid or paid shall except in the case of an employee whose employment was carried on abroad, be deducted by the trustees of the fund at the average rate of tax at which the employee was liable to income-tax during the preceding three years or during such period, if less than three years, as he was a member of the fund, and shall be paid by the trustees to the credit of the Central Government within the prescribed time and in such manner as the Central Board of Revenue may direct.

58-T. Where an employer deducts from the emoluments paid to an employee or pays on his behalf any contributions of that employee to an approved superannuation fund, he shall include all such deductions or payments in the return which he is required to furnish under section 21.

58-U. If a fund or a part of a fund for any reason ceases to be an approved superannuation fund, the trustees of the fund shall nevertheless remain liable to account for tax on any sum paid—

(a) on account of returned contributions (including interest on contributions, if any), and

(b) in commutation or in lieu of annuities, in so far as the sum so paid is in respect of contributions made before the fund or part of the fund ceased to be an approved fund under the provisions of this Chapter.

58-V. The trustees of an approved superannuation fund and any employer who contributes to an approved superannuation fund shall, when required by notice from the Income-tax Officer, within twenty-one days of the date of such notice—

(a) furnish to the Income-tax Officer a return containing such particulars of contributions made to the fund as the notice may require;

(b) prepare and deliver to the Income-tax Officer a return containing—

(i) the name and place of residence of every person in receipt of an annuity from the fund,

(ii) the amount of the annuity payable to each annuitant,

(iii) particulars of every contribution (including interest on contributions, if any) returned to the employer or to employees; and

(iv) particulars of sums paid in commutation or in lieu of annuities;

(c) furnish to the Income-tax Officer a copy of the accounts of the fund to the last date prior to such notice to which such accounts have been made up, together with such other information and particulars as the Central Board of Revenue may reasonably require.

CHAPTER X.

MISCELLANEOUS.

59. (1) The Central Board of Revenue may, subject to the control of the Central Government, make rules for carrying out the purposes of this Act and for the ascertainment and determination of any class of income. Such rules may be made for the whole of British India or for such part thereof as may be specified.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may—

(a) prescribe the manner in which, and the procedure by which, the income, profits and gains shall be arrived at in the case of—

(i) incomes derived in part from agriculture and in part from business;

(ii) persons residing out of British India;

(b) prescribe the procedure to be followed on applications for refunds;

(c) provide for such arrangements with His Majesty's Government as may be necessary to enable the appropriate relief to be granted under section 27 of the Finance Act, 1920, or under section 49 of this Act;

(d) prescribe the year which, for the purpose of relief under section 49, is to be taken as corresponding to the year of assessment for the purposes of section 27 of the Finance Act, 1920; and

(e) provide for any matter which by this Act is to be prescribed.

(3) In cases coming under clause (a) of sub-section (2), where the income, profits and gains liable to tax cannot be definitely ascertained, or can be ascertained only with an amount of trouble and expense to the assessee which, in the opinion of the Central Board of Revenue, is unreasonable, the rules made under that sub-section may—

(a) prescribe methods by which an estimate of such income, profits and gains may be made, and

(b) in cases coming under sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of sub-section (2), prescribe the proportion of the income which shall be deemed to be income, profits and gains liable to tax;

and an assessment based on such estimate or proportion shall be deemed to be duly made in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(4) The power to make rules conferred by this section shall, except on the first occasion of the exercise thereof, be subject to the condition of previous publication.

(5) Rules made under this section shall be published in the Official Gazette, and shall thereupon have effect as if enacted in this Act.

60. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, make an exemption, reduction in rate or other modification, in respect of income tax in favour of any class of income, or in regard to the whole or any part of the income of any class of persons.

(2) Where, by reason of any portion of an assessee's salary being paid in arrears or in advance or by reason of his having received in any one financial year salary for more than twelve months or a payment which is under the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 7 a profit in lieu of salary, his income is assessed at a rate higher than that at which it would otherwise have been assessed, the Central Government may grant the appropriate relief.

(3) After the commencement of the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, the power conferred by sub-section (1) shall not be exercisable except for the purpose of rescinding an exemption, reduction or modification already made.

61. (1) Any assessee, who is entitled or required to attend before the Appellate Tribunal or any Income-tax authority in connection with any proceeding under this Act otherwise than when required under section 37 to attend personally for examination on oath or affirmation, may attend by a person authorised by him in writing in this behalf, being a relative of or a person regularly employed by the assessee, or a lawyer or accountant or Income-tax practitioner, and not being disqualified by or under sub-section (3).

(2) In this section,—

(i) a person regularly employed by the assessee shall include any officer of a Scheduled Bank with which the assessee maintains a current account or has other regular dealings;

(ii) "lawyer" means a Barrister-at-Law or Solicitor or any other person entitled to plead in any Court of law in British India;

THE SCHEDULE.

[See section 10 (7)]

RULES FOR THE COMPUTATION OF THE PROFITS AND GAINS OF INSURANCE BUSINESS

1. In the case of any person who carries on, or at any time in the preceding year carried on life insurance business, the profits and gains of such person from that business shall be computed separately from his income, profits or gains from any other business.

2. The profits and gains of life insurance business shall be taken to be either--

(a) the gross external incomings of the preceding year from that business less the management expenses of that year, or

(b) the annual average of the surplus arrived at by adjusting the surplus or deficit disclosed by the actuarial valuation made for the last intervaluation period ending before the year for which the assessment is to be made, so as to exclude from it any surplus or deficit included therein which was made in any earlier intervaluation period and any expenditure other than expenditure which may under the provisions of section 10 of this Act be allowed for in computing the profits and gains of a business, whichever is the greater.

Provided that the amount to be allowed as management expenses shall not exceed--

(a) $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the premiums received during the preceding year in respect of single premium life insurance policies, plus

(b) in respect of the first year's premiums received in respect of other life insurance policies for which the number of annual premiums payable is less than twelve, or for which the number of years during which premiums are payable is less than twelve, for each such premium or each such year $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of such first year's premiums received during the preceding year, plus

(c) 90 per cent. of the first year's premiums received during the preceding year in respect of all other life insurance policies, plus

(d) 12 per cent. of all renewal premiums received during the preceding year.

3. In computing the surplus for the purpose of rule 2,--

(a) one-half of the amounts paid to or reserved for or expended on behalf of policyholders shall be allowed as a deduction:

Provided that in the first such computation made under this rule of any such surplus no account shall be taken of any such amounts to the extent to which they are paid out of or in respect of any surplus brought forward from a previous intervaluation period:

Provided further that if any amount so reserved for policyholders ceases to be so reserved, and is not paid to or expended on behalf of policyholders, one-half of such amount, if it has been previously allowed as a deduction, shall be treated as part of the surplus for the period in which the said amount ceased to be so reserved;

(b) any amount either written off or reserved in the accounts or through the actuarial valuation balance sheet to meet depreciation of or loss on the realisation of securities or other assets, shall be allowed as a deduction, and any sums taken credit for in the accounts or actuarial valuation balance sheet on account of appreciation of or gains on the realisation of the securities or other assets shall be included in the surplus:

Provided that if upon investigation it appears to the Income-tax Officer after consultation with the Superintendent of Insurance that having due regard to the necessity for making reasonable provision for bonuses to participating policyholders and for contingencies, the rate of interest or other factor employed in determining the liability in respect of outstanding policies is materially inconsistent with the valuation of the securities and other assets so as artificially to reduce the surplus, such adjustment shall be made to the allowance for depreciation of, or to the amount to be included in the surplus in respect of appreciation of, such securities and other assets, as shall increase the surplus for the purposes of these rules to a figure which is fair and just;

(c) interest received in respect of any securities of the Central Government which have been issued or declared to be income-tax free shall not be excluded but the whole amount of such interest received during the intervalation period shall be exempt from income-tax under the second proviso to section 8 though not from super-tax

4. Where for any year an assessment is made in accordance with the annual average of a surplus disclosed by a valuation for an intervalation period exceeding twelve months, then, in computing the tax payable for that year, credit shall not be given in accordance with sub-section (5) of section 18 for the tax paid in the preceding year, but credit shall be given for the annual average of the income-tax paid by deduction at source from interest on securities or otherwise during such period.

5. For the purposes of these rules—

(i) "preceding year" means that year for which annual accounts are required to be prepared under the Insurance Act, 1938, immediately preceding the year for which the assessment is to be made or until the commencement of the Insurance Act, 1938, the previous year as defined in section 2 of this Act;

(ii) "gross external incomes" means the full amount of incomes from interest, dividends, fines and fees and all other incomes from whatever source derived (except premiums received from policyholders and interest and dividends on any annuity fund) and includes also profits from reversions and on the sale or the granting of annuities, but excludes profits on the realisation of securities or other assets:

Provided that incomes, including the annual value of the property occupied by the assessee, which but for the provisions of sub-section (7) of section 10 would have been assessable under section 9 shall be computed upon the basis laid down in the last named section, and that there shall be allowed from such gross incomes such deductions as are permissible under that section.

(iii) "management expenses" means the full amount of expenses (including commissions) incurred exclusively in the management of the business of life insurance, and in the case of a company carrying on other classes of business as well as the business of life insurance in addition thereto a fair proportion of the expenses incurred in the general management of the whole business. Bonuses or other sums paid to or reserved on behalf of policyholders, depreciation of, and losses on the realisation of, securities or other assets and any expenditure other than expenditure which may under the provisions of section 10 of this Act be allowed for in computing the profits and gains of a business are not management expenses for the purposes of these rules:

(iv) "life insurance business" means life insurance business as defined in clause (11) of section 2 of the Insurance Act, 1938;

(v) "securities" includes stocks and shares.

6. The profits and gains of any business of insurance other than life insurance shall be taken to be the balance of the profits disclosed by the annual accounts, copies of which are required under the Insurance Act, 1938, to be furnished to the Superintendent of Insurance, after adjusting such balance so as to exclude from it any expenditure other than expenditure which may under the provisions of section 10 of this Act be allowed for in computing the profits and gains of a business. Profits and losses on the realisation of investments, and depreciation and appreciation of the value of investments shall be dealt with as provided in rule 3 for the business of life insurance.

7. The profits and gains of companies carrying on dividing society or assessment business shall be taken to be 15 per cent. of the premium income of the previous year, or in the case of non-resident companies 15 per cent. of the British Indian premium income of the previous year.

8. The profits and gains of the British Indian branches of an insurance company not resident in British India, in the absence of more reliable data, may be deemed to be the proportion of the total world income of the company corresponding to the proportion which its British Indian premium income bears to its total premium income. For the purpose of this rule, the total world income of life insurance companies not resident in British India whose profits are periodically ascertained by actuarial valuation shall be computed in the manner laid down in these rules for the computation of the profits and gains of life insurance business carried on in British India.

9. These rules apply to the assessment of the profits of any business of insurance carried on by a mutual insurance association.

APPENDIX.

Notification No. 46, dated 15th August, 1942.

(1) Increased rate of depreciation on ocean-going steamers and motor vessels due to war time conditions.—The rate of depreciation allowable on ocean-going steamers and motor vessels will be increased from 5 per cent. to $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum for this period commencing from 1st September, 1939 and ending six months after the cessation of the present hostilities—the date whereof will be notified. The increase will affect years of assessment 1940-41 onwards. In order to secure that all shipping concerns receive the increased allowance for the same length of time, the allowance for the year of assessment 1940-41 will have reference to the proportions, falling before and after the end of August, 1939, of the trading year which is the 'previous year' for income-tax purposes for that year of assessment.

Example 1. If the previous year was the calendar year 1939, the depreciation allowable for the year of assessment 1940-41 will be exempted at the rate of 5 per cent. for 8 months and $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for 4 months.

Example 2.—If the previous year were the year ending 31st March, 1940, this allowance will be computed at 5 per cent. for 5 months and $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for 7 months.

If the assessment for the year 1940-41 has been closed, then where the assessment has been made at 'nil' due to the depreciation allowance not being entirely wiped off, the additional allowance due for that year under this paragraph will be deducted from the profit assessable for the year 1941-42, and in any other case an adjustment will be made in the tax demand for 1941-42 equal to the difference in the tax demand which would have resulted if the additional allowance had been given in the assessment for 1940-41.

(2) The rate of depreciation on second-hand ocean-going steamers and motor vessels.—In the case of a steamer or motor vessel purchased secondhand, the normal allowance will be computed by reference to the actual cost of the steamer or the motor vessel concerned to the new owner and its reasonable expectation of life at the date of purchase. The new rate and the method of computation will have effect from the assessment for 1941-42 and not from any earlier assessment.

The following scale is to be used to determine the fractional part of the cost of a steamer or motor vessel that is to be allowed year by year as depreciation for income-tax purposes, except when at the date of purchase the steamer or the motor-vessel concerned is more than 24 years old. In such a case the rate of depreciation to be allowed will be decided by the Central Board of Revenue on the facts of each case.

Age at date of purchase.		Expectation of life.	Fractional part of costs to be allowed as depreciation each year.
Over years.	Under years.

13	14	8
14	15	8
	and so on.

The scale given above having been applied to find the normal allowance, the extra allowance for war time conditions will be given on the lines laid down in paragraph (1) above. As the increased allowance for a new vessel is one fourth of the normal 5% of cost, the addition in the case of second-hand steamers is to be taken as $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the normal allowance computed by application of the scale.

Example.—A vessel, 12 years old, was purchased at the commencement of the 'previous year' to year of assessment 1937-38 for Rs. 5,00,000. According to the scale the expectation of life at the date of its purchase second-hand was 9 years. For the years of assessment 1941-42 onwards the depreciation allowance would be $\frac{1}{9}$ of Rs. 5,00,000 Rs. 55,555.

For the years of assessment corresponding to previous years that are chargeable accounting periods for Excess Profits Tax purposes, the wartime addition of $\frac{1}{4}$ th referred to in paragraph (1) will be added.

(3) Depreciation on additions to ocean-going steamers and motor vessels which are treated as of a capital nature for income-tax purposes—Any expenditure which has been treated as capital for income-tax purposes (e.g., installation of refrigerator plant or renewal of engines or boilers) will be added to the prime cost of the steamer or motor vessel concerned for the purpose of computing depreciation allowance.

The annual allowance in respect of such expenditure will be calculated as follows:—

(a) if the expenditure is or was made before the expiration of the 20 years estimated life of the steamer or the motor vessel, the normal allowance for it will be increased by such a sum as will exhaust or would have exhausted the expenditure over the remaining years of the 20 years' estimated life.

Example.—An addition of Rs. 60,000 was made to a vessel at the expiration of 17 years of its life. The normal allowance for the addition will be $\frac{1}{3}$ of Rs. 60,000=Rs. 20,000 for each of the remaining three years of the vessel's 20 years estimated life.

(b) If the expenditure is or was incurred when the vessel is 20 years old or more, the allowances will be such a sum as will exhaust or would have exhausted the expenditure over the further estimated years of life that would be given by applying the table on paragraph (2) above, if for 'age at date of purchase' there were substituted 'age at date of the capital expenditure.'

Example.—An addition of Rs. 60,000 was made to a vessel 22 years old. The further estimated life, according to the table in paragraph (2) is 4 years. The normal allowance for the addition will therefore be $\frac{1}{4}$ of Rs. 60,000=Rs. 15,000 for each year of the further estimated life of the vessel.

(c) in respect a vessel purchased secondhand, the normal allowance for the expenditure on additions to such a vessel will be increased by such a sum as will exhaust or would have exhausted the expenditure over the remaining years of the estimated life of the vessel given in the table in paragraph (2) above.

Example.—A vessel was over 8 years and below 9 years old when purchased secondhand so that its expectation of life at the date of purchase secondhand was 12 years. After the lapse of 7 years of this expectation of life, an addition of Rs. 60,000 was made to it. The normal allowance for this addition will be $1\frac{1}{5}$ of Rs. 60,000=Rs. 12,000 for each of the remaining five years of the expected life of the vessel.

The increased allowances so calculated will be allowed for the years of assessment 1941-42 onwards. The extra allowance for wartime conditions will also be given on the lines laid down in paragraph (1) above; but the aggregate allowances on the additions shall not exceed the cost thereof.

NOTES FOR GUIDANCE IN FILLING UP RETURN FORM No. I. T. 11.

Important changes in the Act have been made by the Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, and assesseees are advised to read carefully such of these notes as are appropriate to their cases.*

1. On the publication of the notices referred to in Section 22 (1) of the Act every person or association of persons whose total income exceeds the maximum amount not chargeable with income-tax is required to make a return of his total income and his total world income whether or not he has been served with an individual notice under section 22 (2) of that Act. The maximum amount which is not chargeable to Income-tax is as follows:—

In the case of—

(i) Any Court of Wards, Administrator-General, Official Trustee, any Receiver, or Manager appointed under any order of a Court, or any trustee or trustees appointed under a trust declined by a duly executed instrument in writing whether testamentary or otherwise, where the income, profits or gains or any part thereof are not specifically receivable on behalf of any one person or where the individual shares of the persons on whose behalf they are receivable are indeterminate or unknown. Rs. Nil.

(ii) Any company or local authority Rs. Nil.

(iii) Any person, being a British subject or the subject of a State in India or Burma or a native of a Tribal Area who is not resident in British India and whose total world income exceeds Rs. 2,000. Rs. Nil.

(iv) Any other non-resident person. Rs. Nil.

(v) Any other individual, Hindu Undivided Family, Firm or association of persons. Rs. 2,000

Total income is the total income chargeable under the Act, and total world income includes all income wherever accruing or arising unless exempted under section 4 (3) of the Act.

1-A. If the total income of an assessee who is an individual, Hindu undivided family, unregistered firm or other association of persons, includes any "earned income" as defined in section 2 (6-AA) of the Income-tax Act, such portion of the earned income as is specified in the annual Finance Act is exempt from income-tax and is to be deducted from the "total income" in determining the income-tax (but not super-tax) payable by the assessee.

2. "Previous year" means for each separate source of income—

(a) the year ended on 31st March prior to the income-tax year, or at the option of the assessee, the year ended on the date (prior to the 31st March) to which his accounts have been made up, or

(b) the year prescribed by the Central Board of Revenue for any case or class of cases.

Certain conditions attached to the exercise of the option referred to in (a) and certain further conditions govern the determination of "previous year" in respect of a business, profession or vocation newly set up, and these are shown in Clause (11) of section 2 of the Act.

For each source of income for which the previous year does not end on the 31st March the last date of the previous year should be shown.

3. Sources of income.—The following income must be included in your return under the appropriate head:—

*Notes in these notes the "Act" means the Income-tax Act, 1922.

(a) So much of the income of your wife as arises directly or indirectly from—

- (i) her membership in a firm of which you are a partner;
- (ii) assets transferred directly or indirectly to her by you otherwise than for adequate consideration or in connection with an agreement to live apart.

(b) So much of the income of your minor child as arises from—

- (i) his (or her) admission to the benefits of partnership in a firm of which you are a partner;
- (ii) assets transferred directly to him (or her) by you otherwise than for adequate consideration unless she is a married daughter.

(c) So much of the income of any person or association of persons as arises from assets transferred by you to the person or association otherwise than for adequate consideration for the benefit of your wife or minor child or both.

(d) All income arising to any person by virtue of a settlement or disposition whether revocable or not and whether effected before or after the commencement of the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, from assets which remain your property, or by virtue of a revocable transfer of assets.

[Section 16 (1) of the Act contains definitions of “revocable” and “settlement or disposition”, and sets out also certain exceptions.]

(e) Income from assets transferred to persons not resident, or, if resident not ordinarily resident for the purpose of avoiding tax in the circumstances set out in section 44-D.

(f) Income from securities, stocks or shares which have been sold before the date of payment of the interest or dividend and repurchased subsequently in the circumstances set out in sections 44-E and 44-F.

4. An individual is “resident” in British India if he—

(i) is in British India in that year for a period amounting in all to one hundred and eighty-two days or more; or

(ii) maintains or has maintained for him a dwelling place in British India for a period or periods amounting in all to one hundred and eighty-two days or more in that year, and is in British India for any time in that year; or

(iii) having within the four years preceding that year been in British India for a period or for periods amounting in all to three hundred and sixty-five days or more, is in British India for any time in that year otherwise than on an occasional or casual visit; or

(iv) is in British India for any time in that year and the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that such individual having arrived in British India during the year is likely to remain in British India for not less than three years from the date of his arrival.

A Hindu Undivided Family, firm or other association of persons is resident in British India unless the control and management of its affairs is situated wholly without British India; and

A company is resident in British India in any year—

(a) if the control and management of its affairs is situated wholly in British India in that year, or

(b) if its income arising in British India in that year exceeds its income arising without British India in that year.

An individual is ordinarily resident in British India if he has been resident as defined above in nine out of ten years preceding that year and has been in British India for periods amounting in all to more than two years during the seven years preceding that year.

A Hindu Undivided Family is deemed to be "ordinarily resident" in British India if its manager is ordinarily resident in British India. A company, firm or other association of persons is "ordinarily resident" in British India if it is resident in British India.

5. Tax already charged or deducted at source.—In this column only British Indian Tax should be entered. Super-tax deducted at source should be shown separately (unless, in the case of a salaried person, the assessee is unaware of the allocation between Income-tax and Super-tax). In the case of a dividend from a Company the tax to be entered is the tax appropriate to that part of the dividend which has borne Income-tax and should be calculated at the rate in force for companies for the year in which the dividend was paid. Where this figure of tax is not known, it should be estimated and the word "estimated" written below the figure. The correct figure will then be computed in the Income-tax office. If any tax deducted at source is in excess of the amount on which you are chargeable, the excess will be deducted from any other tax payable by you provided that certificates of tax deducted are attached to the return.

6. "Salaries" includes wages, pensions (if payable anywhere in India including an Indian State and if earned in British India), annuities, gratuities, fees, commission, allowances, perquisites, value of rent-free quarters and profits received in lieu of or in addition to salary or wages. The full amount should be entered and not the net amount after deducting Income-tax, your provident fund contributions, etc.

Prior to the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, the basis was the amount of salary received in the previous year. It is now the amount actually received or the amount due whether paid or not. An advance of income is to be treated as salary on the date on which the advance is received.

If by the conditions of your employment you are required to spend any sum out of your remuneration wholly, necessarily and exclusively in the performance of your duties you may claim a deduction for such a sum and should give particulars. Travelling expenses from your house to your place of employment are not allowable.

A payment received by you as an employee from your employer or former employer or from a provident or other fund at or in connection with the termination of your employment is taxable to the extent to which it does not consist of the return of your own contributions or interests, thereon. Payments made solely as compensation for loss of employment and certain payments from provident funds to which the Provident Funds Act, 1925, applies, from a recognised provident fund or from an approved superannuation fund are exempted.

7. Interest on Securities means interest on promissory notes or bonds issued by the Government of India or any Provincial Government, or the interest on debentures or other securities issued by or on behalf of a local authority or company. The gross amount before deduction of Income-tax should be entered.

Entries under this head should be accompanied by the certificate issued by the person paying the interest under section 18 (9) of the Act.

Deductions are allowable in respect of—

(a) commission charged by a banker for collecting the interest.

(b) interest payable on money borrowed for the purpose of investment in the securities except certain interest payable to persons abroad from which tax has not been deducted (see section 8 of the Act for details). Full particulars (in a separate statement if necessary) should be given of any deduction claimed.

8. Property.—The tax is payable, under this head in respect of the bona fide annual value of all buildings or lands appurtenant thereto, of which you are the owner, other than such portions of such buildings and lands as you occupy for the purpose of your business, profession or vocation the profits of which are assessable to tax. In arriving at the bona fide annual value add to the full rent payable by the tenant to the owner such rates and taxes paid by him as are leviable on property and are to be borne by the owner, and deduct such taxes for services as are payable by the tenant but for convenience are borne by the owner.

9. Business, Profession or Vocation.—You should complete item 4 (a) of Part I, and Parts IV and V of the Return in respect of any business, profession or vocation if you are the sole proprietor, or if you are making the Return on behalf of your firm. If you are a partner in a registered firm, or if your firm has applied for registration you must complete item (4) (b) of Part I and if you are a partner in an unregistered firm you must complete item 4 (c) of Part I.

For the purpose of completing items 4 (b) and 4 (c) of Part I, the share of a Partner is to be determined as follows:—

(i) The share is the share to which he was actually entitled during the previous year and not the share to which he was entitled on the date on which the assessment is to be made.

(ii) It includes all interest (whether on loan or capital account, and whether actually paid or not) and all salary, commission or other remuneration paid, payable or credited to him.

Losses are to be computed in like manner as profits, and the balance of any loss made in the previous year for assessment for the year 1939-40, which cannot be set off wholly against other income of the same year, can be carried forward and set against the profits of the same business, profession or vocation of the following year.

Under the third proviso to Section 4 (1) persons resident (whether ordinarily resident or not ordinarily resident) are entitled to an allowance of Rs. 4,500 from the income accruing or arising abroad but not remitted to British India. This amount should be deducted as follows:—

(i) in the first instance from the income accruing or arising abroad which is to be shown in section A of the Return;

(ii) the balance, if any, from the income to be shown in item (b) of section C;

(iii) the remainder, if any, from the income to be shown in items (c) and (d) of section C.

Local authorities.—The income of local authorities which is chargeable to Income-tax is the profits and gains from a trade or business carried on by those authorities other than income arising from the supply of a commodity or service within its own jurisdictional area.

10. Dividends from companies.—The gross amount should be entered after adding to the net sum received Income-tax computed as explained in Note 5 above. Where the exact tax is not known, the estimated tax should be added and the figure of net dividend put in column 1 followed by the word "net".

11. (a) Income from Agriculture from land not paying land revenue or local rates to an authority in British India, and all agricultural income arising abroad (including Indian States and Burma) should be included under this head if received in British India.

(b) Remittances received by a wife resident in British India from her non-resident husband are deemed to be income accruing in British India and must be included in her Return if they are not paid out of income included in her husband's total income.

12. Non-residents.—Income-tax is payable by a non-resident on the total of section A. If he is a British subject or the subject of a State in India or Burma or a native of a Tribal Area the Income-tax is computed by reference to the average of rates appropriate to the total of sections A and C. The income of other non-residents is chargeable at the full company rate. The income of all non-residents is chargeable to super-tax on the total of section A at the average of the rates appropriate to the total of sections A and C. A dividend paid without British India is deemed to be income accruing and arising in British India to the extent to which it has been paid out of profits subjected to Income-tax in British India.

13. For the Income-tax year 1939-40 only tax is not chargeable in respect of both the income accruing or arising outside India in the previous year and the income brought into British India during that year out of income accruing or arising in earlier years but only in respect of the greater of these two amounts. If the former sum is the greater, section B (2) should be marked "covered by section C," and if the latter is the greater, section C should be marked "covered by section B (2)."

14. Sums entered in Part II cannot be deducted from total income, but, subject to the limits laid down in the Act, a deduction will be made in respect of such sums from the income-tax payable at the average rate for the total income. No deduction from super-tax is given in respect of these sums, except in certain special cases of members of unregistered firms and other associations of persons as provided for in the second proviso to section 55.

15. The proviso to section 7 (1) of the Act, applies to sums deducted in accordance with the conditions of service for the purpose of securing a deferred annuity or of making provision for the employee's wife or children.

16. Details of the amounts to be entered in respect of a recognised Provident Fund should be obtained from the trustees of the fund or from your employer.

17. Part IV.—(a) In computing the profits or gains of a partnership all sums paid or credited to a partner must be disallowed. These sums will be taken into account in allocating the gross income of the business between the partners to ascertain the individual share of each partner. All sums of interest, salary or commission will thus be included in the partners' share of the firm's income and will not be again assessed on that partner as interest, salary or commission respectively.

(b) Attention is particularly drawn to the provisions of section 10 (2) (iii) and section 10 (4) (a) of the Act which prohibits the deduction of any payment of interest chargeable under the Act which is payable without British India except interest on which tax has been paid or from which tax has been deducted, or in respect of which there is an agent who may be assessed under section 43, or any payment chargeable under the head "Salaries" if it is payable without British India and tax has not been deducted. An exception is made in the case of interest on a loan issued for public subscription before 1st April, 1938. These provisions do not apply to interest or salary which is not chargeable to Income-tax under the Act (i.e., interest on money borrowed abroad from a non-resident and not brought into British India in any form whatever, or salary or services rendered wholly abroad by a non-resident.)

(c) Depreciation.—For the assessment years 1940-41 and 1941-42, depreciation allowance is to be calculated at prescribed rates on the basis of "written down" value instead of on the basis of "original cost." The "written down" value is to be computed as follows:—

- (a) In the case of assets acquired in the previous year, the actual cost represents the "written down" value.
- (b) In the case of assets acquired before the previous year but after the commencement of the Amendment Act, 1939 the actual cost less all depreciation allowable under section 10 of the Act.
- (c) In the case of assets acquired before the commencement of the Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, the actual cost less for each financial year since acquisition the amount of depreciation applicable to the assets at the rates in force for each year since 1st April, 1922, and at the rates in force on the 1st April, 1922, for each such year prior to date, but so much of the unabsorbed depreciation allowance as has been carried forward up to and including the assessment year 1938-39 to which full effect has not been given in the assessment for the year 1939-40 is not to be deducted in arriving at the "written down" value.

With effect from the assessment for the year 1942-43 and subsequent years the "written down" value is to be computed as follows:—

- (a) in the case of assets acquired in the previous year, the actual cost represents the "written down" value.
- (b) in the case of assets acquired before the previous year, the actual cost to the assessee less all depreciation actually allowed under the Act or any Act repealed thereby or under executive orders issued when the Indian Income-tax Act, 1886, was in force.

(c) If you spoil this form you should ask your Income-tax Officer for another. Erasures should not be made. You should sign your name in full against any alteration.

N.B.—(a) Income accruing to you outside British India received in British India is liable to taxation, and must be entered by you in the form.

(b) All income, from whatever source derived, must be entered in the form, including income received by you as a partner of a firm.

NOTE 1.—In column 2 should be shown the gross amount of salary and not the net amount after deductions on account of income-tax, provident funds, etc.

NOTE 2.—“Interest on securities” means the interest on promissory notes or bonds issued by the Government of India or a Local Government, or the interest on debentures or other securities for money issued by or on behalf of a local authority or Company. Where income-tax has been deducted from the interest, or where the interest has been paid income-tax free, the amount of tax so deducted or paid should be added to the amount of interest actually received, and the gross amount so arrived at should be entered in column 2 of the statement. The term “interest on securities” does not include interest on fixed deposits or mortgages or other loans, which have to be shown under heading 8.

The interest on securities of the Government of India or of Local Governments declared to be income-tax free should be shown under head 3. Those which are not declared to be income-tax free should be included under this head.

Entries under this head must be supported by the certificate issued by the person or Company paying the interest under section 18 (9) of the Act.

NOTE 3.—(a) The income-tax payable on the interest receivable on a security of a Local Government issued income-tax free is payable by the Local Government and not by the holder of the security.

(b) Only the interest on securities of the Government of India or of a Local Government declared to be income-tax free should be entered against this head. Such interest will not be charged to income-tax, but it must be included in the statement of total income in order to ascertain the rate of income-tax chargeable on other income. It is chargeable to super-tax.

(c) Particulars of any interest on securities issued by other authorities, and stated to be free of income-tax should be entered against head 2, as income-tax on such interest is actually paid by these authorities on behalf of the recipients.

NOTE 4.—The tax is payable under this head in respect of the bona fide annual value of any buildings or lands appurtenant thereto of which you are the owner, other than such portions of such buildings and lands as you may occupy for the purpose of your business.

NOTE 5.—(a) Where you keep your accounts on the mercantile accountancy or book profits system, you must file a return in the following form:—

State here amount of salary paid to a partner and not added back on the ground that it is not an appropriation of profits ... Rs.

(b) Where you do not keep your accounts on the mercantile accountancy or book profits system but on a cash basis, you must file a statement showing how you arrive at the taxable profits, i.e., showing details of the gross receipts and of the expenditure you propose to set against those receipts specifying separately salary paid to partners and deducted from gross receipts as not being an appropriation of profits. No deductions are permissible on account of—

(i) Property owned and occupied by the owner of a business for the purposes of a business;

(ii) Additions to, or alterations, extensions, or improvements of, any of the assets of the business;

(iii) Interest on the capital of the proprietors or partners of the business;

(iv) Bad debts not actually written off in the accounts;

(v) Losses sustained in previous years;

(vi) Reserves of any kind;

(vi) Sums paid on account of the income-tax or super-tax or any tax levied by a local authority other than local rates or municipal taxes in respect of the portion of the premises used for the purpose of the business;

(viii) Any expenditure of the nature of charity or a present;

(ix) Any expenditure of the nature of capital;

(x) Any loss recoverable under an insurance or a contract of indemnity;

(xi) Depreciation of any kind other than that specified in the Act;

(xii) Drawings or salary of proprietor, drawings of partners and salary of partners if it be an appropriation of profits;

(xiii) Private or personal expenses of the assessee;

(xiv) Any expenditure of any kind which is not incurred solely for the purpose of earning the profits.

If you have included any such sums in your expenditure in your books, you must exclude them from the expenditure permissible for the purpose of arriving at your taxable profits.

(c) You are also required to attach a statement showing the sums charged in your accounts under the provisions of section 58-K (2).

NOTE 6.—The income, profits or gains shall be computed after making allowance for any expenditure (not being in the nature of capital expenditure) incurred solely for the purpose of such profession or vocation, provided that no allowance is made on account of any of your personal expenses. Professional fees received by you in any part of India (whether within British India or not) must be included by you in your receipts.

NOTE 7.—Income-tax chargeable on the profits of companies is paid by the Companies, so that the dividends received by the shareholders represent the net amount remaining after any Income-tax due by the company has been paid. This amount should be entered in column 2 of the statement. The proportionate tax will be added in the Income-tax Office.

If the rate of tax applicable to your total income is less than the rate of tax applicable to the profits or gains of the Company at the time of the declaration of such dividends, you may, by attaching the Company's certificate received with the dividends, have the excess collected on your dividends from the Company set against the tax payable by you on your other income instead of having to apply separately for a refund.

NOTE 8.—Agricultural income from land not paying land revenue or local rates to an authority in British India should be included under this head or under income from business according to circumstances.

NOTE 9.—Deductions from total income can only be made for insurance premia in respect of insurance on your own life or on the life of your wife, or in respect of a contract for a deferred annuity on your own life or on the life of your wife. No deduction is permissible in the case of any other form of insurance except in the case of Hindu undivided families where deductions are permissible on account of premia paid in respect of insurance on the life of any male member of the family or of his wife. The original receipt or the certificate of the insurance company to which the premium was paid, must be attached to the return.

NOTE 10.—(a) Under the Head 9-A you should enter so much of the income of your wife or minor child as arose directly or indirectly—

- (i) from the membership of your wife in a firm of which you are a partner;
 - (ii) from the admission of your minor child to the benefits of partnership in a firm of which you are a partner;
 - (iii) from any assets transferred by you directly or indirectly to your wife otherwise than for adequate consideration or in connection with an agreement to live apart; and
 - (iv) from any assets transferred by you directly or indirectly to your minor child, not being a married daughter.
- (b) Under this head you should also enter so much of the income of any association of individuals consisting of yourself and your wife as arises from any assets transferred by you to such association.

The date and place of hearing of the appeal shall be fixed with reference to the current business of the Bench, the place of residence of the parties, and the time necessary for the service of the notice of appeal, so as to allow the parties sufficient time to appear and be heard in support of or against the appeal.

31. Where the appeal is under sub-section (1) of section 33 of the Act, the chief ministerial officer in fixing the date for the respondent to appear and answer to the appeal shall allow a reasonable time for the necessary communication with the Commissioner, through the proper channel and for the issue of instructions to an authorised representative to appear and answer on behalf of the respondent.

32. The notice of the day of hearing of the appeal shall declare that if the party does not appear before the Bench in person or by an authorised representative on the day so fixed, the appeal will be heard ex-parte.

* * * * *

33. (1) A notice under these rules may be served on the person therein named either by post or, as if it were a summons issued by a Court, under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (Act V of 1908).

(2) Any such notice may, in the case of a firm or a Hindu undivided family, be addressed to any member of the firm or to the manager, or any adult male member of the family and, in the case of any other association of persons be addressed to the principal officer thereof:

Provided that where a memorandum of appeal states that a Hindu undivided family, firm or other association of persons has appealed through a particular person, notice of the hearing of the appeal shall be served on that person; and where the appeal is against such family, firm or association and a particular person is mentioned in the memorandum of appeal as the person representing the respondent family, firm or association, the notice shall also be served on that person.

34. The notice of the hearing of the appeal may be served on an authorised representative of a party provided that in the case of an assessee the notice may be so served only if such representative has filed his authority in the appeal.

PART V.

Hearing, Adjournment and Judgment.

35. On the day fixed, or on any other day to which the hearing may be adjourned, the appellant shall be heard in support of the appeal. The Bench shall then, if it does not dismiss the appeal at once, hear the respondent against the appeal, and in such case the appellant shall be entitled to reply.

36. (1) Where on the day fixed for hearing or any other day to which the hearing may be adjourned, the appellant does not appear when the appeal is called on for hearing, the appeal unless adjourned to some other day, may notwithstanding such default be decided on merits.

(2) Where the appellant applies for the withdrawal of the appeal, the appeal shall be dismissed.

37. Where the appellant appears, and the respondent does not appear when the appeal is called on for hearing, the appeal shall be heard ex parte.

37-A. Where the appeal has been heard in the absence of a party, the party may apply for a re-hearing of the appeal and if he satisfies the Bench that the notice of the hearing of the appeal was not duly served on him or that he was prevented by any sufficient cause from appearing when the appeal was called on for hearing, the Bench shall re-hear the appeal on such terms as it thinks fit.

An application under this rule shall be made to the Bench which heard the original appeal within 30 days of the date of the order in appeal, or where the notice of the appeal was not duly served within 30 days of the date when the party had knowledge of the order.

37-B. (1) Where an assessee, whether he be the appellant or the respondent to an appeal, dies or is adjudicated insolvent, the appeal shall not abate and may if the assessee was the appellant, be continued by, and if he was the respondent be continued against, the executor, administrator, or other legal representative of the assessee or by or against the official receiver.

(2) Where an appeal has been heard in the absence of such executor, administrator, legal representative or receiver, he may within a reasonable time apply for the re-hearing of the appeal and if he satisfies the Tribunal that the appellant had no notice of the date of hearing of the appeal or that he was prevented by any sufficient cause from appearing on the day when the appeal was called on for hearing, the Tribunal shall, on such terms as it thinks fit, re-hear the appeal.

Adjournment.

38. The Bench may (on such terms as it thinks fit) and at any stage adjourn the hearing of the appeal.

Judgment.

39. Deleted

40. The judgment of the Bench shall be in writing and shall—

(i) in the case of a unanimous judgment be signed and dated by all the members of the bench;

(ii) in the case of a judgment of the majority be signed and dated by the members of the majority; and

(iii) in the case of a third member case be signed and dated by the member. Provided that nothing in this rule shall preclude the members of a unanimous bench or the members of a concurring majority of the bench from writing separate judgments or absolve a dissenting member or members from the obligation of recording his or their opinion on the point or points on which he or they dissent.

41. Deleted.

42. The bench determining an appeal shall as soon as the judgment is signed communicate the result of the appeal to the parties and the Commissioner in the manner in which notice of the date of hearing of an appeal may be served on the parties.

Provided that where the Central Government has appointed a representative at the headquarters of the bench duly empowered to receive such communications, the result of the appeal may be communicated to such representative instead of to the Commissioner.

43. Deleted.

PART VI.

Applications for Reference.

44. Section 66 Reference application shall be in the prescribed form and shall be accompanied by a copy thereof.

45. Subject to the special provisions of this Part, the provisions of Parts III and IV of these rules shall apply to the presentation, notices and hearing of a Reference Application as if it were an appeal:

Provided that an authorised representative need not comply with the provisions of rule 25 if he has already filed his authority and its acceptance in the appeal which gives rise to the application.

46. Where the application is by the assessee, the Commissioner of Income-tax to whom the opposite party to the appeal which gives rise to the application is subordinate shall be made a respondent.

47. Where the application is by the Commissioner of Income-tax, the assessee shall be made a respondent.

48. The application shall comply with the following:—

(a) The findings arrived at in the order under sub-section (4) of section 33 and relevant to the questions of law required to be referred to the High Court shall be stated therein.

(b) Each such question shall be concisely formulated therein.

(c) A list of documents giving particulars thereof which the applicant desires to be forwarded to the High Court shall be appended to it.

49. Where the correctness of a finding arrived at in the order under sub-section (4) of section 33 is questioned on the ground that in arriving at the finding the Bench determining the appeal committed an error of law, the application shall state the precise error of law.

50. Where the application is in order, it shall be registered in the Register of Reference applications and sent with the relevant record for disposal by the Bench which decided the appeal or to such other Bench as the President may direct.

51. The Chief Ministerial Officer of the Bench receiving the application under rule 50 shall send for the connected records and fix a day for the hearing of the application, of which notice shall be given to the applicant.

52. On the day fixed or any other day to which the hearing may be adjourned, the Bench shall hear the applicant or his authorised representative in support of the application and may, without sending notice to the respondent dismiss the application if it is of the opinion that no question of law arises out of the order under sub-section (4) of section 33 or if no question of law has been formulated in the application.

53. Where the Bench does not dismiss the application under rule 52, it shall send notice of the date of hearing the application to the respondent accompanied by a copy of such application and require him to submit, within such time as it may fix, a reply in writing to the application.

54. The reply to the application shall specifically admit or deny whether the question formulated by the applicant arises out of the order under sub-section (4) of section 33 or not and whether it is a question of law or not. If the question formulated by the applicant is defective, the reply shall state in what particular the question is defective and what is the exact question of law which arises out of the said order. The reply shall be accompanied by a copy thereof. A list of documents giving full particulars thereof which the respondent desires to be forwarded to the High Court appended to the reply.

59. After giving the parties an opportunity to be heard the Bench shall dismiss the application if no question for reference to the High Court has been formulated in the application, or when it is of opinion that the question formulated by the applicant is not one of law or does not arise from the order under sub-section (4) of section 33.

59-A. Where the Bench considers that a question of law arises out of the order under sub-section (4) of section 33 it shall draw up a statement of the case and send it together with the records to the Headquarters of the Tribunal.

62. Deleted.

63. The Bench drawing up a statement of the case shall append to the statement a list of the documents to which reference may be necessary at the hearing of the Reference in the High Court.

64. Deleted.

65. The result of every application for Reference shall be notified to the parties.

66. Where a case has been received from the High Court under sub-section (2) or sub-section (4) of section 66 of the Act, the case shall ordinarily be sent to the Bench which refused to state the case, and the Bench receiving it shall state the case in the light of the order of the High Court.

67. A statement of the case under rule 66, shall, as far as possible, comply with all the requirements of this Part.

68. When the reply to a reference has been received by the Tribunal under sub-section (5) of section 66, it shall ordinarily be sent to the Bench which originally dealt with the application for Reference and final orders in the case shall be passed by the Bench.

PART VII.

THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX ACT (XI OF 1922).

An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to Income-tax and Super-tax.

WHEREAS it is expedient to consolidate and amend the law relating to Income-tax and Super-tax; it is hereby enacted as follows:—

Short title, extent and commencement.

1. (1) This Act may be called THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX ACT, 1922.

(2) It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan and the Sonthal Parganas, and applies also, within the Indian States and tribal areas, to British subjects who are in the service of the Crown or of a local authority established in the exercise of the powers of the Crown representative or the Central Government in that behalf, and to all other servants of the Crown in the said States and areas.

(3) It shall come into force on the first day of April, 1922.

Preamble.—As regards the construction of titles, preambles, etc., see Rules of Construction in the Introduction. The present Act consolidated the previous Income-tax and Super-tax Acts and amended them in the light chiefly of the recommendations of the All-India Income-tax Committee of 1921. There have been over twenty five amending Acts since 1922 of which the most important and extensive was the one of 1939 on the result of an enquiry by a committee of three experts in 1936—37.

British India.—Under section 3 (7) of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897), as substituted by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937, "British India" shall mean, "as respects the period before the commencement of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, all territories and places within His Majesty's Dominions which were for the time being governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor or other subordinate to the Governor-General of India, and as respects any period after that date, means all territories for the time being comprised within the Governor's Provinces and the Chief Commissioner's Provinces, except that a reference to British India in an Indian Law passed or made before the commencement of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall not include a reference to Berar." Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, came into force on 1st April, 1937. Burma was part of British India till that date.

The Act applies to scheduled districts which are part of British India, and no notification is necessary under section 3 to extend the Act to such areas, Subhagmal Neemchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 7 I.T.C. 100.

India.—Under section 3 (27), ibid., “India” shall mean ‘British India’ together with all territories of any Indian Ruler under the suzerainty of His Majesty, all territories under the suzerainty of such an Indian Ruler, the tribal areas and any other territories which His Majesty in Council may, from time to time, after ascertaining the views of the Central Government and the Central Legislature, declare to be part of India.

According to section 3 (27) (b), ibid., “Indian States”—“shall include any territory whether described as a State, an Estate, a Jagir or otherwise, belonging to or under the suzerainty of a Ruler who is under suzerainty of His Majesty and not being part of British India”.

According to section 311 of the Government of India Act, 1935, “Tribal areas”, “shall mean the areas along the frontiers of India or in Baluchistan which are not part of British India or of Burma or of any Indian State or of any Foreign State”.

Local authority.—Under section 3 (28), ibid., “Local authority” means ‘a Municipal Committee, District Board, body of Port Commissioners or other authority legally entitled to, or entrusted by the Government with, the control or management of a municipal or local fund’.

If the General Clauses Act has been extended to an administered area, then there can be local authorities there within the meaning of that Act.

Scope of Act.—The personal and territorial jurisdiction of the Indian legislature is determined by section 99 of the Government of India Act, 1935. The question was raised in Governor-General in Council v. Raleigh Investments, 1944 I.T.R. 265 (F.C.), whether the Indian Legislature could tax a dividend payable abroad by a non-resident company to a non-resident shareholder even though such dividend came out of profits earned in British India; and answered by the Federal Court in the affirmative. A similar question arose in Wallace Brothers v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1945 I.T.R. 39 (F.C.) in which it was held by the same Court that the Indian Legislature was competent to enact sub-clause (b) of clause (c) of section 4-A under which a company is deemed to be resident if its profits within British India exceeds its profits without British India. There is no extra-territoriality in such a provision and even if there was, the provision was not ultra vires the Indian Legislature.

Sub-section (2) governs the whole Act. The jurisdiction has primary reference to the liability to tax, and if there is liability, the Act gives jurisdiction to give effect to the objects of the Act. The liability does not depend on the effectiveness of the machinery to enforce liability, Crane v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 Tax Cases 316; Whitney v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 10 Tax Cases 88 (H.L.).

The jurisdiction of the Indian Legislatures is regulated under section 99, Government of India Act, 1935 which runs as below:—

“99 (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Federal Legislature may make laws for the whole or any part of British India or for any Federated State, and a Provincial Legislature may make laws for the Province or any part thereof.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by the preceding sub-section, no Federal law shall, on the ground that it would have extra-territorial operation, be deemed to be invalid, in so far as it applies—

(a) to British subjects and servants of the Crown in any part of India; or

(b) to British subjects who are domiciled in any part of India wherever they may be; or

(c) to, or to persons on, ships or aircraft registered in British India or any Federated State wherever they may be; or

(d) in the case of a law with respect to a matter accepted in the Instrument of Accession of a Federated State as a matter with respect to which the Federal Legislature may make laws for that State, to subjects of that State wherever they may be; or

(e) in the case of a law for the regulation or discipline of any naval, military, or air force raised in British India, to members of, and persons attached to, employed with or following, that force, wherever they may be."

Sub-section (2) of section 99 referred to above does not confer any power on the Federal Legislature; it has been inserted out of abundant caution lest the omission of the corresponding provisions in the 1915 Act should wrongly suggest the withdrawal of these powers. The words 'without prejudice to the generality in' show that the first sub-section covers also the five specific cases referred to in the second.

Unlike the 1915 Act which referred to "persons, places and things within British India", the 1935 Act empowers the Federal Legislature to make laws "for the whole or any part of British India" and on the matters referred to in Lists I and III of the Seventh Schedule. Entry No. 23 of List I "fishing and fisheries beyond territorial waters" shows that no extra-territorial ban was intended on the powers of the Legislature; the only limitation is that implicit in the words "laws for British India".

"The constitution requires that it must be possible to predicate of every valid law that it is for the peace, order and good government of the dominion with respect to a granted subject e.g., customs, taxation, external affairs. In such cases, the presence of non-territorial elements in the challenged law has to be considered on a slightly different footing and those affirming its validity have to show not only that the dominion has some real concern or interest in the matter, thing or circumstance dealt with by the legislation, but that the concern or interest is of such a nature that the challenged law is truly one with respect to an enumerated subject-matter" per Evatt, J. in Trustees, Executors and Agency, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Taxation, (1933) 49 Bom.L.R. 220, quoted with approval by the Federal Court in Governor-General in Council v. Raleigh Investments, 1944 I.T.R. 265.

Though the Statute of Westminster does not apply to India, the Constitution Act of 1935 should be interpreted in the light of the discussions on the subject that had been taking place between 1926 (the year of the Imperial Conference) and 1935. Even independently of the Statute of Westminster it was held in Croft v. Dunphy, 1933 A.C. 156 that "once it is found that a particular topic of legislation is among those on which the Dominion Parliament may competently legislate as being for the peace, order and good government of Canada or as being one of the subjects enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act, their Lordships see no reason to restrict the permitted scope of such legislation by any other consideration than is applicable to the legislation of a fully sovereign state."

The Federal Legislative list—List I of Schedule VII of the Government of India Act, 1935—includes “Corporation tax” (Item 46) and “Taxes on income other than agricultural income” (Item 54) while List II of the same schedule, viz., the Provincial Legislative List includes “Taxes on agricultural income” (Item 41). Under section 311 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1935, unless the context otherwise requires—“Agricultural income” means agricultural income as defined for the purposes of the enactments relating to Indian Income-tax, and “Corporation tax” means any tax on so much of the income of companies as does not represent agricultural income, being a tax to which the enactments requiring or authorising companies to make deductions in respect of income-tax from payments of interest or dividends, or from other payments representing a distribution of profits, have no application.

Section 7 (2) of the Income-tax Act applies only to the particular class of income mentioned therein, namely, “salaries”; and sets out the extent to which a particular item of income not accruing, arising, or received in British India and not paid or accruing to a resident in British India may be deemed to be chargeable within the meaning of section 4. Section 1 governs section 7 (2) also, and the latter, it will be seen, does not—as indeed it cannot—go beyond the scope of section 1, which in its turn is determined by section 99 of the Government of India Act.

See also notes under sections 22 (Serving notices on non-residents); 29 (Issuing notice of demand); 64 (4) (Jurisdiction of the Income-tax Officer); and 65 (Indemnity).

History.—The words “and to all other servants of His Majesty in those dominions” were added in 1918. Formerly only British subjects serving outside British India were liable.

The words “Sonthal Parganas” were added in 1918. Previously the Act had been extended by the Sonthal Parganas Settlement Regulations (III of 1872) and (III of 1899).

The words “including British Baluchistan” were added in 1922. Formerly, the Act was applied by notification only to salaries and pensions paid by Government or local authorities. Several formal changes were made by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order in Council, 1937.

Appendix I sets out in abstract the Notifications under the Foreign Jurisdiction Order in Council extending the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922 with or without changes, to areas outside British India.

Administered areas—Income arising, etc., in.—An administered area is not part of British India, but a part of an Indian State administered under orders of His Majesty in Council, British Indian Laws being applied to these areas ad hoc to the extent necessary from time to time under the Foreign Jurisdiction Order in Council.

Berar, however, has been specially treated under section 47 (1) (b) of the Government of India Act, 1935, “any reference in this Act or in any other Act to British India shall be construed as a reference to British India and Berar. . . .” This however applies only to laws passed on or after 1st April, 1937. See definition of “British India”.

Salaries in Indian States.—In Indian States, all persons in the service of Government, of whatever nationality, are liable to tax, but only those servants of local authorities who are British subjects are taxable. If a Government servant is lent to a "local authority" in an Indian State, (i.e., one established by the Crown representative or the Central Government) he will be taxable whether he is a British subject or not because he does not cease to be a servant of His Majesty owing to his being lent to a "local authority"; but a Government servant lent to an Indian State for service in that State is not taxable as he ceases to be a servant of His Majesty—see section 7 (2). Other British subjects in Indian States are not taxable on salaries paid there.

United Kingdom Law.—The English Income-tax Acts do not contain any provisions similar to this section. The scope of the Acts there is defined by the various charging sections and the interpretations placed on them by the Courts. See the remarks of Lord Herschell in Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490, H.L., quoted in the Introduction, p. 19. See also Whitney v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1926) A.C. 37; 10 Tax Cases 88, cited under section 22 as regards the taxation of non-residents, and the remarks of Tomlin, J., regarding the scope of the Australian Income-tax laws in London & South American Investment Trust v. British Tobacco Co., Ltd., 42 T.L.R. 771; (1927) 1 Ch. 107.

".....'income' means such income as is within the Act and taxable under the Act.... The Act nowhere purports to tax income which is neither derived from property in the United Kingdom nor received by a person resident in the United Kingdom. The word 'income' wherever found in the statute is to be understood as excluding income neither so derived nor so received." Per Lord Wrenbury in Whitney v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, quoted by Finlay, J., in Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown, 17 Tax Cases 333, as a general statement of the law on this point.

Definitions.

repugnant in the subject or context,—

"In this Act".—The definitions should be followed in construing not only the Act proper but also the Rules and Notifications. These definitions are supplementary to those in the General Clauses Act except where they definitely override them.

(1) "agricultural income" means—

(a) any rent or revenue derived from land which is used for agricultural purposes, and is either assessed to land revenue in British India or subject to a local rate assessed and collected by officers of the Crown as such:

(b) any income derived from such land by—

(i) agriculture, or

(ii) the performance by a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind of any process ordinarily employed by a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind to render the produce raised or received by him fit to be taken to market, or

(iii) the sale by a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind of the produce raised or received by him, in respect of which no process has been performed other than a process of the nature described in sub-clause (ii);

(c) any income derived from any building owned and occupied by the receiver of the rent or revenue of any such land, or occupied by the cultivator, or the receiver of rent-in-kind, of any land with respect to which, or the produce of which, any operation mentioned in sub-clauses (ii) and (iii) of clause (b) is carried on:

Provided that the building is on or in the immediate vicinity of the land, and is a building which the receiver of the rent or revenue or the cultivator or the receiver of the rent-in-kind by reason of his connection with the land, requires as a dwelling house, or as a store-house, or other out-building:

History.—In the Income-tax Act of 1860 agricultural income was taxed. This was given up in 1865. In the Act of 1867 the tax was levied only as a licence tax on professions and trades, and agriculture was neither a 'profession' nor a 'trade'. In 1869, an income-tax was levied upon all incomes, including agricultural income, and in 1873-74 this was given up. In 1877 a licence tax was levied upon traders and artisans but not upon agriculturists on whom a cess on land was levied. In 1886 a regular Income-tax Act was passed but exempting agricultural income and the exemption is still in force. The principal reason for exempting agricultural income from 1877 onwards appears to have been, not the fact that landlords paid revenue to Government (which of course was in return for the use of land) but that they paid a cess on land corresponding to income-tax. This cess was not negligible having regard to the low rates of income-tax then prevalent; and it was considered that landlords should not be asked to contribute to the general exchequer more than once (apart from the payment of land revenue which, as already stated, was held to be not a contribution to the public revenue but a payment for the use of land). In those days when the Cess Acts were passed and an income-tax levied on agricultural income, the owners of permanently settled estates carried on a powerful agitation against these imposts on the ground that the new taxes constituted a breach of the Permanent Settlement. The Government met these complaints, not by exempting permanently settled estates as such from income-tax, but by exempting all agricultural income whether the lands were permanently settled or not. The omission of the 1886 Act to refer expressly to permanently settled estates led, as will be seen from the Introduction, to considerable litigation regarding the liability to income-tax of non-agricultural income from permanently settled estates.

In 1918 when the Income-tax Act was amended and consolidated, Government intended to take into account agricultural income for the purpose of fixing the rate at which an assessee should pay tax but this was opposed in the Legislative Council and the proposal was dropped. In 1922, when the Act was again revised, Government desired to exclude 'forestry' from agricultural income, but this also was opposed in the Assembly and the proposal was dropped. Agricultural income, as now defined in the Act, is not only exempt from income-tax but must not even be taken into account in considering the 'rate' at which the assessee should be taxed on his non-agricultural income. Nor can it be taken into account even for super-tax, however large the income. The existence of agricultural income is thus completely ignored by the Central Income-tax Officer for all purposes.

Since 1st April, 1937, the taxation of agricultural income is a subject for Provincial Legislation (see notes under section 1) and three Provincial Governments (Bengal, Bihar and Assam) have already imposed such taxation. Another province, viz., Madras has, it seems, decided to levy such impost and perhaps more provinces will do so in the near future.

Under the Income-tax Acts prior to 1922, profits from the sale by a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind of the produce raised or received by him were included under "agricultural income" only if he did not keep a shop or stall for the sale of such produce. Under the Act of 1922 such profits are exempt from taxation if the produce is sold in a raw state or after it is subjected only to such processes as an ordinary cultivator would employ. The present Act, it will be seen, makes the law more lenient.

The words "in British India" in clause (a) and "such land by" in clause (b) did not occur in previous Acts. So, income from lands outside British India, e.g., in Indian States—whether falling under clauses (a)—any rent or revenue, or (b)—income derived from cultivation, etc., or (c)—from occupied buildings—escaped taxation. Under the present Act only income from such land as is either assessed to land revenue in British India or subject to a local rate assessed and collected by officers of Government as such is exempt from income-tax.

Though the second proviso to sub-section (2) of section 4 relating to agricultural income in Indian States, inserted in 1933 and deleted in 1939 led to litigation and divergence of views eventually going up to the Privy Council (See In re Mohanpura Tea Co., 1937 I.T.R. 118 (Cal.) and Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathews, 1939 I.T.R. 48 (P.C.)), the difficulty turned, not on the interpretation of "agricultural income" but on the construction of section 4; those problems therefore are of little interest now. It should be noted however that section 14 was amended in 1941, so as to tax a resident in British India on his income in Indian States on the basis roughly speaking, of such income brought into British India; and it should be remembered that the definition in section 2 (1) will not cover agricultural income in Indian States, since such income will not arise from land paying revenue or cess in British India.

The words "the Crown" were substituted for "Government" in clause (a) in 1937.

Restriction on change of definition.—Under section 141 (1) of the Government of India Act, 1935, no Bill or amendment varying the meaning of the expression, "agricultural income" as defined here can be introduced or moved except with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in his discretion.

Onus.—Under item (viii) of sub-section 3 of section 4 'agricultural income' shall not be included in the 'total income' of the person receiving it; and, as in respect of all exemptions and reliefs, it lies on the assessee to show that a particular item of income which he claims to be "agricultural" is in fact such. In re, Maharajadhiraj of Burdwan, 1940 I.T.R. 378 (Cal.).

Point of time.—The question whether land is used for agricultural purposes is to be determined with reference to facts at the time of accrual of the income under dispute and has no reference either to the purpose of a lease if any or to the uses to which the land may be put either before or after the time of accrual of the income. In re, Sir Bijoychand, Madhab, 1940 I.T.R. 378 (Cal.).

Conditions to be satisfied by the land.—The definition imposes the following conditions. The land must first of all be used for an agricultural purpose. As to what constitutes such purpose, see below. The land should also be (1) either assessed to land revenue in British India or (2) subject to a local rate assessed and collected by officers of the Crown as such. In practice there is hardly any land not belonging to the Crown which is not assessed to land revenue or local rates, i.e., none which escapes both. Even waste lands which are settled are assessed to revenue though up to a certain stage the revenue is remitted. Lands like those of Col. Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan in Shahpur District, Punjab (cited infra) are rare.

Local rates.—The Act does not define "local rates" and there is no general definition in other statutes in India. There are definitions in English statutes but they are clearly inapplicable to India. A 'rate' as distinguished from a 'tax' is sometimes used to denote a payment for service rendered, but such a distinction is not relevant to the present context. The expression "local rates" evidently means taxes for the benefit of local authorities, i.e., District Boards, Municipalities, etc. See Hulas Narain Singh v. Bihar, 1942 I.T.R. 115 (P.C.), a case under the Bihar Agricultural Income-tax Act. It was argued in the case of Malik Umar Hayat Khan, 2 I.T.C. 52, that, if a land is not assessed to land revenue but pays irrigation rates to Government, 'local rates' should be construed to include such irrigation rates as well; but the Court did not give a ruling on this point and decided the case on other grounds.

A further condition is that such local rates should be assessed and collected by officers of Government as such. A tax, therefore, levied by a municipality which is assessed and collected by its own officers, would not come within the definition. Such land could not escape income-tax unless it was assessed to Land Revenue. On the other hand, income from land assessed to Road and Educational cesses and cesses for the aid of District Boards and District Committees which are almost invariably assessed and collected by officers of Government would be exempt.

Under the Bengal Cess Act, for example, through a District Board may be empowered to determine the rate of cess from time to time, so long as the cess is assessed and collected by officers of the Crown as such, the income from the lands will be 'agricultural income' and thus exempt from income-tax, if the land satisfies the other conditions of the definition. In so assessing and collecting the cess an officer of the Crown is functioning as such, and not as an agent or a delegate of the District Board; the capacity in which the Collector or other officer of the Crown functions will not be altered by the destination of the cess when collected, Hulas Narain Singh v. Bihar, 1942 I.T.R. 115 (P.C.). Officers of the Crown referred to in this definition are officers in British India and in any case exclude officers outside India such as Burma. Chockalingam Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 122.

What constitutes Agriculture?—There is no definition in the Act of the term "agriculture" nor is a simple definition of such a common and comprehensive word possible. The word should, therefore, be interpreted with reference to common usage as well as to the general spirit and the tenor of the Act. Usage, however, differs and the word is used sometimes in a wide sense and sometimes in a narrow one. The ordinary dictionary meanings of agriculture are as below:—

(Webster.)

"The tillage of the land, the art of cultivating the soil, including the allied pursuits of gathering of the crops and rearing live-stock, also husbandry—farming, in the widest sense". (Murray's Oxford Dictionary.)

The definitions and rulings in the United Kingdom Income-tax Acts are of limited assistance in construing the Indian Income-tax Act because the scheme of taxation of agricultural income is different in the two countries.

In a case under the United Kingdom Excess Profits Duty Acts Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Ransom, (1918) 2 K.B. 709; 12 Tax Cases 21. Sankey, J., said at p. 712:

"The contention for the Crown is that 'husbandry' means farming. I do not agree with that contention. I think that husbandry is a term of very wide signification and, though I am not prepared to hold that a man who tills and cultivates the soil is, in all circumstances, a husbandman or a man engaged in 'husbandry', I can see no distinction between a man who does so in order to produce food for human consumption and a man who does so in order to produce medicines and herbs, also for human consumption."

In Keir v. Gillespie, 7 Tax Cases 473, it was held that the term "husbandry" was not restricted to tillage or cultivation of the soil but included the use of lands for the purpose of grazing sheep.

Per the Lord President.—Confessedly no light is thrown by the Statutes on the meaning of the word "husbandry." It has no technical or secondary meaning. It must be taken in its ordinary acceptation. What is that? It is confined to tillage or cultivation. . . . or does it embrace "all farming operations" . . . For the answer . . . I rather think we must turn to the dictionary and having regard to the object and the purpose of the statutes we are construing take the widest meaning which is there first put upon the expression. (In) Stormonth's Dictionary . . . I find 'husbandry' defined first as "the business of a farmer" and "husbandman" as the "man who manages the concerns of the soil". . . . According to the New English Dictionary 'husbandry' signifies "the business or occupation of a husbandman or farmer including also the raising of livestock and poultry." In Murray's Dictionary a like meaning is given to the term. The attempt to confine 'husbandry' to the 'tillage' of the soil fails. For 'tillage' is defined as "the act or practice of preparing land for seed and raising crops." To adopt it . . . would be to confine husbandry to the raising of crops which are artificial and not natural. 'Husbandry' has in these days come to have a much more extended meaning than that; but even if turning over the soil to enable a crop to be grown were essential we have it in the cutting of the drains on the sheep farm. 'Husbandry' as Mr. Justice Kenny . . . said in re the Cavan Co-operative Society, (1917) 2 I.R. 594, 608, "presupposes a connection with land and production of crops or food in some shape" but, let me add, it shall not pre-suppose the use of artificial means to prepare the land for raising the crops. . . . Neither judicial decision nor statutory enact ment nor practice throws any light upon it. All that one can say about it is that in common parlance lands devoted to grazing sheep are occupied "for the purposes of husbandry" and that a sheep farmer is in the ordinary acceptation of the term a 'husbandman'.

Per Lord Mackenzie.—It may be that in its origin the word "husbandman" meant the man who ploughed and planted as distinguished from the man who owned flocks and herds. No such limited meaning can now be attached to the word.

Per Lord Skerrington.—I think at the present day the primary and natural meaning of the word 'husbandry' as applied to land includes all those uses of the land which are common to what at the present day we describe as farmers. In short the rearing of sheep and cattle and the production of milk are a familiar and daily duty of the husbandman.

There are several rulings in India interpreting the word 'agricultural' with reference to other Acts, but none of these interpretations can be adopted automatically in construing the Income-tax Act, because those Acts are not in pari materia with the Income-tax Act. Thus in a case under the Madras Estates Land Act, Rajah of Venkatagiri v. Ayyappa Reddi, 38 Mad. 738, it was decided by the High Court that 'agriculture' does not include pasturage, but it would be obviously improper to apply this interpretation for the purposes of the Income-tax Act, even if this view was not open to doubt (in fact it has been doubted by the same Court in a later case).

On the other hand, in a case under the Madras District Municipalities Act, Emperor v. Alexander Allan, 25 Mad. 627, the same High Court held that pasture land was agricultural and therefore exempt from enhanced rates.

Per Davies and Moore, JJ.— We have no hesitation in holding that land on which potatoes, grain, vegetables, etc., are grown are lands used solely for agricultural purposes. We do not consider that any distinction can be drawn between large and small plots of lands on which roots or grain are cultivated.

Turning again to the definition of the word "agricultural" which we have accepted we find that agricultural lands include lands set apart as pasture ground only, also lands used for rearing live-stock. If, therefore, it could be shown that these so-called waste lands were in reality pasture grounds or lands used for rearing live-stock, we should certainly decide that they were lands used solely for agricultural purposes.

"The primary meaning of 'agriculture' is the cultivation of the ground; and in its general sense, it is the cultivation of the ground for the purpose of procuring vegetables and fruits for the use of man and beast including gardening or horticulture and the raising or feeding of cattle and other stock. Its less general and more ordinary signification is the cultivation with the plough and in large areas in order to raise food for man and beast; or in other words that species of cultivation which is intended to raise grain and other field crops for man and beast. Horticulture, which denotes the cultivation of gardens or orchards, is a species of agriculture in its primary and more general sense."—Per Bhashyam Aiyangar, J., in Murugesu Chetti v. Chinnathambi Goundan, (1901) I.L.R. 24 Mad. 421 (in which the question was whether a lease was agricultural).

In Panadai Pathan v. Ramdasami, 45 M. 710, on the other hand, Spencer, J.—"With due deference, while accepting that the case was rightly decided, I am unable to follow the opinion of Bhashyam Aiyangar, J., in Murugesu Chetti v. Chinnathambi Goundan, (1901) I.L.R. 24 Mad. 421, that the word 'agriculture' in its more general sense comprehends the raising of vegetables, fruits and other garden products as food for man and beast, if the learned Judge intended thereby to limit it to the raising of food products. For to so restrict the word would be to exclude flower, indigo, cotton, jute, flax, tobacco and other such cultivation. For the purposes of that particular case, which related to a lease of betel gardens, considering the policy of favouring agriculture, upon finding that they produced a form of food, the connection between agriculture and the production of food may have seemed important, but such a limitation is not supported by the definition of agriculture in the Oxford Dictionary which is: 'the science and art of cultivating the soil, tillage, husbandry, farming (in the widest sense)'. This dictionary notes that a meaning restricted to tillage is rare. In Bouvier's Law Dictionary 'agriculture' is defined as the cultivation of the soil for food products or any other useful or valuable growths of the field garden.

"Shepherd, J., who sat with Bhashyam Aiyangar, J., conceded that the earlier decision, Kunhayan Haji v. Mayan, 17 Mad. 98, to which he was a party which decided that the lease of a coffee garden was not an agricultural lease, was wrong.

"I am equally unable, with respect, to agree with the narrow definition of Sadasiva Ayyar, J., in Seshayya v. Rajah of Pitapur, (1916) 3 L. W. 485 and Rajah of Venkatagiri v. Ayyappa Reddi, 38 Mad. 738, that agriculture means the raising of annual or periodical grain crop through the operation of ploughing, sowing, etc., though the decision may be perfectly sound so far as they excluded pasture lands from 'ryoti land' for the purpose of the Madras Estates Land Act.

"The learned Judge's definition would exclude sugarcane, indigo, tea, flower, tobacco and betel cultivation from agriculture.

"In my opinion agriculture connotes the raising of useful or valuable products which derive nutriment from the soil with the aid of human skill and labour and thus it will include horticulture, arboriculture and silviculture in all cases where the growth of trees is effected by the expenditure of human care and attention in such operations as those of ploughing, sowing, planting, pruning, manuring, watering, protecting, etc." See also per Reilly, J., in Chandrasekhara Bharathi v. Duraisami Naidu, 54 Mad. 900, 903, et seq. Also see Kesho Prasad Singh v. Sheo Pragash Ojha, 46 All. 831 (P.C.).

As already observed, these rulings under other Acts are of very limited assistance in interpreting the Income-tax Act, but they will show that the word 'agriculture' has a rather wide and indefinite connotation.

Obviously 'agriculture' is not necessarily confined to the cultivation of foodstuffs. While it is not difficult to raise cases on the borderland which could be considered to be both agricultural and not agricultural, it is not so easy to exhaust, by enumeration, the possible agricultural uses to which land can be put. Evidently they must include dairying, poultrying, rearing of live-stock, gathering of wool, etc.; but all such uses might be non-agricultural in certain circumstances. Thus dairying with stall-fed cattle in urban areas or poultrying in similar areas could scarcely be considered agricultural. But these instances would also in most cases be excluded by the very definition of 'agricultural income' in the Act, which pre-supposes that the income is derived from land assessed to Land Revenue, etc. Even if the land is assessed to Land Revenue, if on the facts it is held that the operations are those of trade and not of agriculture, the profits would be taxable, land revenue being allowed as a deduction.

If cattle are kept in an urban area and wholly stall-fed and not pastured on the land at all, doubtless, the case is one of non-agricultural trade, and no agricultural operation is being carried on. If, on the other hand, cattle are exclusively or mainly pastured on land and are nonetheless fed with small quantities of oilcake or the like, it may well be that income from the sale of milk is agricultural income. Between these two extremes the question is one of degree and therefore, of fact, and it is for the Income-tax authorities to decide on which side of the line a given case falls, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Kokine Dairy, A.I.R. 1938 Rang. 260 (F.B.); 1938 I.T.R. 502. The profits of a milk-seller who merely purchases from cattle-owners and sells the milk, etc., to others are clearly profits from trade and cannot be brought under any of the clauses in the definition of "agricultural income".

A co-operative society buying milk from its members and selling the butter in the open market, returning the skimmed milk to its members, does not carry on 'husbandry', though the making of butter by an ordinary farmer on his farm would be 'husbandry', Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Cavan Central Co-operative Society, 12 Tax Cases 1; (1917) 2 I.R. 594 and 622. "As well might the owner of a machine for threshing corn or of a steam plough or of a mill for grinding corn or of a machine for spraying potatoes be held to be engaged in the trade or business of husbandry" per Kenny, J. In this case the members of the society were not necessarily farmers or engaged in husbandry, though the bulk of the milk was supplied by farmer's grazing cows on their farms.

Rule 4 of Case III of Schedule D in the United Kingdom Income-tax Act provides for cases of milk and cattle dealers who are charged supplementarily to the charge under Schedule B in certain cases. These conditions give a clue as to when in such cases agriculture becomes "trade". The conditions are (1) the man must be a dealer in cattle or a dealer in, or a seller of, milk; (2) the lands must be insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought on to the lands; and (3) the lands must be so insufficient that the assessable value of the lands affords no just estimate of the profits. Condition (3) cannot be applied even by analogy in India in face of the definition of agricultural income, but conditions (1) and (2) seem to be applicable. In the United Kingdom, it is important whether a land is a 'farm' or a 'garden'; and the matter has gone up to the House of Lords. Bomford v. Osborn, 1944 I.T.R. 27 (Sup.).

Rulings in India.—Income from inland fisheries has been held to be not agricultural, (Maharajadhiraj of Dharbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 Pat. 470; 1 I.T.C. 303; 51 Cal. 504, the decision in which was approved by the Privy Council in 58 Cal. 430 (P.C.); Commissioner of Income-tax v. Sevuga Pandia Thevar, 56 Mad. 251 (F.B.); 1933 I.T.R. 78. Profits from sea fisheries, including pearl and 'chank', and fisheries in public ponds, lakes, etc., are clearly not entitled to the exemption at all even assuming that by any possible straining of words they could be considered 'agricultural' because the 'land' (if the sea is "land") is not assessed to land revenue in British India.

Income from markets, moorings and ferries, (1 I.T.C. 303; 3 Pat. 470, supra; see also 51 Cal. 504; 54 Cal. 863; and 56 Mad. 251, supra) stone quarries (Shiblal Gangaram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 50 All. 98) coal, manganese, mica, etc., is not agricultural. The profits from a mela (fair) held on land admittedly agricultural are not agricultural income. (Umed Rasul v. Anath Bandhu, 28 Cal. 637.) So also the income from the use of land for storing purchased food crops, etc., 2 I.T.C. 392, supra, and from land let out for making bricks (Maharani Janki Kuer v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 5 I.T.C. 42).

The income derived from honey whether the deposit is spontaneous or derived from the rearing of bees, is perhaps agricultural; and if the land is assessed to land revenue or a local rate, exempt from income-tax. On the other hand rent received by a surface owner in return for permitting the owner of underground rights to withdraw support for the surface would not be income from agriculture. See incidentally, Elliot v. Burn, 18 Tax Cases 595: (1934) 1 K.B. 109 (H.L.).

Forestry.—According to the executive instructions in the Income-tax Manual, income from timber or leaf grown on one's own land is agriculture, but not that from cutting down and selling timber belonging to others. But even when grown on his own land, the question may still arise whether the income is agricultural, e.g., from spontaneous growths. In Chief Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Zemindar of Singampatti, 1 I.T.C. 181; 45 Mad. 518, the Court inclined to the view that income from forests was agricultural, but this was obiter. There was no doubt, however, that receipts for stacking timber on forest land (Emperor v. Probbhat Chandra Barua, 1 I.T.C. 284 (Cal.); Har Prasad v. Emperor, 1 I.T.C. 417 (Lah.) are not 'agricultural'. The view taken in the Singampatti case was however doubted by the same Court in a later case.. Manavedan Tirumalapad v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 4 I.T.C. 421, but that case was decided on a different ground, viz., that the land was not assessed to land revenue or local rates. In a case referring to Bihar Agricultural Income-tax, it was decided by the Patna High Court, after reviewing several authorities, that neither income from the sale of wood (spontaneously grown) in jungle nor that from letting land and trees for the cultivation of lac nor that from wild forest in the jungle is agricultural income, because none of them required cultivation in the ordinary sense. Land held for agricultural purposes can only be land under cultivation, i.e., active effort to grow things on the part of man. Bihar v. Pratap Udainath, 1941 I.T.R. 313. It has been similarly held by the Oudh Chief Court with reference to income-tax that the word 'agricultural' should be understood, for this purpose, in its primary sense and that therefore income from the sale of trees growing spontaneously (without the aid of human agency) in a forest on land assessed to land revenue is not agricultural. Maharaja of Kapurthala v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1945 I.T.R. 74; Special Manager, Court of Wards v. Ditto., 1945 I.T.R. 94; Raya Mustafa Ali Khan v. Ditto., 1945 I.T.R. 98. Whether receipts from felling timber in a forest, assuming that the income is not agricultural, are capital receipts or income receipts is a different matter, regarding which see notes under section 3.

Grazing Lands—Leased.—The position of income derived from land leased out and used for grazing cattle of other persons than the lessee is not clear. In the United Kingdom it has been decided that such profits constitute profits of 'trade' and not income from 'husbandry' McKenna v. Herlihy, 7 Tax Cases 620.

In Donald v. Thomson, 8 Tax Cases 272, the assessee rented certain grass parks outside his farm and utilized them for the grazing of young dairy cattle with which to replenish his farm stock. It was held that the profits from the seasonal occupation of the grazings outside the farm were assessable to income-tax under Schedule D, i.e., as profits from business; and not as agricultural income. The assessee had been assessed in the usual course under Schedule B, i.e., occupation of agricultural land. See however Glunely v. Wightman, 17 Tax Cases 634 (H.L.) post for the opposite view.

Leased Lands.—The land need not be cultivated by the owner himself. If it is leased the income would still be income from agriculture both to the lessor and to the lessee. Where there are intermediary lessees or tenure holders—whatever the nature of interest and whatever the local tenure, the income of all these holders and lessees is clearly agricultural.

A father, son and daughter formed a partnership to manage leased agricultural land. The daughter leased her share to the other two, the management vesting in the father under whose directions the son, who was to reside on the estate, managed it. Subject to certain limits, both the father and the son received certain allowances entirely at the discretion of the father, the son's allowance depending on his residence on the estate. After deducting all expenses including the allowances, the net income was divisible between father and son in the proportion of two to one. It was held that: (a) the payment received by the son was exempt only in so far as it represented his due share of the income from the land and (b) there was sufficient material for the Income-tax authorities to find that a part of the allowance was salary, whether paid by the firm to the assessee or by one co-owner to another, Major Conville v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1935) I.T.R. 404; A.I.R. 1935 Lah. 978. Whether or not land is used for agricultural purposes is to be determined with reference to facts at the time of accrual of the income in dispute and not with reference to the purpose of the lease if any. In re Bijoy Chand Madhav, 1940 I.T.R. 378 (Cal.).

Mortgaged Lands.—Income from a simple mortgage on land is clearly not income from agriculture. Whether income from land held in usufructuary mortgage is income from agriculture has been the subject of much discussion. In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Subramania Sastrigal, 2 I.T.C. 152, the Madras High Court held that when a person carrying on money-lending business lends money in the course of such business on the security of lands of which he takes usufructuary mortgage and immediately leases these lands back to the borrowers, the rent of the lands being a definite percentage of the loans given, such rent is not agricultural income. The Allahabad High Court in the cases of Mukand Sarup, 2 I.T.C. 495; 50 A. 495, and Banwarilal, questioned this view. The scheme of the Act does not distinguish between agricultural income on the one hand and business income on the other, and even if the income was admittedly from business there was nothing to prevent that part of the income which was derived from agriculture being exempt under section 4 (3) (viii). The court considered therefore that unless the mortgage was a sham (the consequences of such a mortgage they did not examine) the income was clearly agricultural. In a later case, Ibrahim, etc., Rowther v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 33; 51 Mad. 455 the Madras High Court receded from the view originally taken and adopted the line of reasoning of the Allahabad High Court and their conclusion.

Without deciding the general question whether income from genuine usufructuary mortgage, is exempt or not, the Patna High Court decided in Rajniti Prasad Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 914; A.I.R. 1930 Pat. 33 that when a usufructuary mortgage and a lease back are executed simultaneously and reciprocal references are made in the two documents, they should be construed together as parts of one and the same transaction. In the particular case, it was obvious from the two documents read together, that the intention of the parties was that the mortgagee was not to enter into possession nor really to enjoy the usufruct. The Madras case of Ibrahim Rowther was distinguished on the ground that in that case there was no mention in the mortgage deed of any rate of interest whereas in Rajniti's case there was. The soundness of the Allahabad ruling was also questioned.

In a later case, Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga, (1934) I.T.R. 107; A.I.R. 1934 Pat. 178 in which the balance of income after certain deductions was taken in reduction of the loan, the Patna High Court ruled that the source of income should be considered in its proximate rather than in its ultimate significance, that is, without reference to the intention of the mortgagee in making the investment. Consequently, income from agricultural lands held in usufructuary mortgage is income from agriculture.

If the mortgagor receives rent from tenants it is agricultural income in his hands and ceases to be such when he parts with it. Similarly, if the mortgagee himself receives the rent, it is agricultural income in his hands and ceases to be such when he parts with it. The fact that the mortgagee has to meet the repair and establishment charges out of the rent and credit the balance to interest and principal does not affect the nature of the income, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Janab Khoyce Sahib, (1935) I.T.R. 1.

An exemption is conferred, and conferred indelibly, on a particular kind of income and does not depend on the character of the recipient, contrasting thus with the exemption conferred by the same sub-section [section 4 (3) (iii)] on the income of local authorities. As Ashworth, J., said in Makund Sarup's Case, 2 I.T.C. 495 "the business of money-lending may bring an income which is exempt from income-tax on the ground that it is derived from agricultural land". It is, therefore, immaterial whether the lender in an usufructuary mortgage on agricultural lands is a professional money-lender or not, Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Sri Kameshwar Singh, (1935) I.T.R. 305; 14 Pat. 623 (P.C.).

Under an arbitration award, a life annuity had to be paid to an assessee; there was default, and a scheme was drawn up to extinguish the liability within ten years. Under this scheme, the debtor's agricultural property was mortgaged to the assessee in usufruct and at a certain rate of interest. The assessee simultaneously leased the land back to the debtor; and the question arose whether any part of the rent received could be considered as interest because the assessee appropriated a part of the rent towards interest. The answer was given in the negative, because the proximate source of the annual payment received by the assessee was the lease; the whole of the rent receivable under this lease was agricultural income. There is nothing inherently suspicious about a possessory mortgage accompanied by a lease of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor although there has been no handing over of the land to the mortgagee and back to the mortgagor as lessee. At the termination of the lease the mortgagee is entitled to possession if that is the effect of the document. The transaction cannot be treated as a simple mortgage, and evidence to show the intention of the parties or to contradict the express terms of documents is not admissible, being forbidden by section 92 of the Evidence Act, Raja Mustafa Ali Khan v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1945 I.T.R. 98 (Oudh), following Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., v. Maharaja of Darbangha, 1934 I.T.R. 107 and Feroz Shah v. Sabhat Khan, 60 I.A. 273 (not an Income-tax case).

In a case in which though a mortgage purported to be with possession, the mortgagee was in fact entitled only to a fixed sum every year from the lessee (the land having been already under lease) in consideration of the money lent, and had otherwise no concern with the produce of the land or possession thereof, it was held that the mortgage was in fact a simple mortgage, and that the fixed sum received from the lessee was not income from the land, Muhamad Yakub Khan & Muhammad Aslam Khan v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 308; A.I.R. 1929 Lah. 206.

An assessee who had advanced money (in 1913) on simple mortgage sued for the money in 1928 and obtained a compromise decree (in 1925) under which he was to recover a certain amount by a certain date (1931) failing which the mortgaged lands were to become his. A receiver was appointed under the decree and the net rents collected by him were to be given to the assessee in reduction of the amount due under the decree, and the assessee was to receive only the balance from the debtor. The debtor defaulted, and the assessee received possession of the land in 1933, but there was further litigation in respect of the title to lands, which was settled in 1936. The question arose as to the nature of the payments received by the assessee creditor from the receiver; and they were held not to be agricultural income since the mortgage was simple and not usufructuary, Ar. Vr. S. Veerappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1941 I.T.R. 56.

Interest in kind.—If a loan is made in cash before the cultivation season and repaid in kind at harvest time, the excess value of the latter over the amount lent is taxable. The fact that the lender is the landlord and the borrower his tenant makes no difference, and the income in such cases arises from lending money and not from the functions of the landlord as such, Haji Cassim Tayub Soorty v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 10 Ran. 77; A.I.R. 1932 Rang. 19.

Rent in kind.—Where, during a period of low prices of paddy, a landlord who also traded in paddy, bought up the crops from the tenants at more than the market price, lest the tenants should repudiate payment of rents, and paid the balance to the tenants after retaining the rents due to him, the Income-tax Officer was not allowed to re-cast the trading profits as though the paddy had been bought at market price nor was the landlord allowed to deal with the rent as if it had been paid in kind. The transaction was ordered to be treated as one on a cash basis at the higher price, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Kyauktaga, Ltd., 1937 I.T.R. 580.

Toddy.—Income received from toddy is agricultural when it is received by the actual cultivator, whether owner or lessee, of the land on which the trees grow. If the income is obtained by a person who has not produced the trees from which the toddy is tapped or has not done any agricultural operation whereby the trees have been raised, it is not agricultural income within the meaning of the Act, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Yagappa Nadar, 105 I.C. 489; 2 I.T.C. 470. The ratio decidendi was that there can be no lease of trees apart from the land, and in this case the assessee admitted that he had no interest in the land.

Tobacco and Tendu.—Profits on the sale of tobacco leaves not grown by the assessee but bought from others is not agricultural income. On the other hand even though a plant may grow wild and propagate itself, any attention thereto however slight, is cultivation of the soil and income arising from the plant in so far as processes are not applied to it, not ordinarily applied by cultivators is agricultural income. In re Moolji Sicka & Co., 1939 I.T.R. 493 (Cal.).

Water—Income from—Whether agricultural.—In Malik Umar-Hayat Khan and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 52, a case probably sui generis, the assessee who owned certain canals purchased water from Government for which they paid irrigation rates and sold it to certain agriculturists who paid for it in kind by a share of the produce. It was contended on behalf of the assessee (1) that the income was derived from land—either from the land constituting the water-courses or the land of those using the water, the latter giving a share of the produce as rent for the water; (2) that if the income was derived from the land forming the water-courses, that land paid 'irrigation' rates which, it was contended, should be included in 'local rates' (the latter not having been defined) and that if the income was held to be derived from the lands of those using the water, the latter was assessed to land revenue; (3) that the land constituting the water-courses should be held to be subservient or appurtenant to the lands cultivated with the water purchased; and (4) that as the income was dependent upon the crop of the lands cultivated by the purchasers, it should be considered to be income from these lands. The Court held that the income was not derived from land at all but simply from the sale of water and that the fact that the price was paid in kind and not in cash made no difference whatever. It therefore held that the income was not 'agricultural income', and the other points raised by the assessee were therefore not considered.

Payments out of Agricultural income.—An annuity payable under a will even though paid out of agricultural income is not such income unless the annuity is a rent charge on specific agricultural property or represents a definite share of the income of the estate and is not merely a general charge over the whole estate. Where it is only a general charge, it might be paid out of the corpus of the estate or out of the non-agricultural part of the income, Zamindarini of Tiruvur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 3 I.T.C. 428; Shrimati Sundrabai Saheb v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 5 I.T.C. 493; In re Sultana Begum, 1933 I.T.R. 379; 9 Luck. 115. See also In the matter of Lal Suresh Singh Kalakankar, 158 I.C. 810; 1935 O.W.N. 1143.

An allowance paid to a junior member of an impartible estate out of the income of the latter, even when such income was from agriculture, was held on the facts not to arise from agriculture but from the bounty or gift by the estate and to be therefore not exempt from tax, In re Maharaj Kumar of Visianagaram, 1934 I.T.R. 186; 56 All. 1009.

In Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Gopal Sharan, 1934 I.T.R. 264, approved by the P.C. in 1935 I.T.R. 237; 14 Pat. 552, the assessee claimed unsuccessfully that an annuity which he had obtained inter alia in exchange for his estate was agricultural income. It was held not to be so, since the annuity had to be paid irrespective of the actual income from the estate. The fact that the assessee had a charge upon the property for the fulfilment of the contract did not affect the nature of the annuity. See also Jagdish Chandra v. Dhanpati Singh, 1945 I.T.R. 64 (Pat.)—a case under the Bihar Agricultural Income-tax Act.

The mere fact that the payment is charged on land will not convert into agricultural income, a payment made to a junior member of an impartible family, Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P. v. Lal Suresh Singh, 1935 I.T.R. 356. (In this case exemption was not claimed on the ground that the assessee received the payment as a member of the family.) An allowance paid to a junior member of a family, under orders of Government, out of a jagir (an assignment of land revenue) is agricultural income in the hands of the recipient if the Government intended that a part of the assignment as such should pass to the junior member, Kunwar Kantar Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1937 I.T.R. 569.

An ex gratia allowance partly in consideration of the resumption of lease of agricultural lands is not agricultural income. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Pandit Dhanesvardhan Misra, 1940 I.T.R. 416.

Where a mutawali of a wakf was remunerated by a salary of so much per month and not by a portion of the income of the wakf, the salary was held not to be agricultural income even though the income of the wakf was. Nawab Habibullah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1943 I.T.R. 295 (P.C.). Where, however, a mutawali was entitled to appropriate towards his remuneration and personal expenditure the residual income of a wakf the income of which was partly from agriculture, it was held that a proportion of the residual income should be treated as agricultural income. A mere technical change of form is insufficient to deprive income of its agricultural character. Syed Mohamed Isa v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1942 I.T.R. 267 (All.). The remuneration paid to a partner, in addition to his share of profits, for managing agricultural properties, but not being a definite fraction of the agricultural income is not agricultural income though paid out of such income. Danby v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1944 I.T.R. 351 (Pat.).

Rent and Revenue.—What the framers of the Act meant by the distinction between 'rent' and 'revenue' is not clear. The words have come in the same form from 1886 and from a practical point of view the distinction is not of importance as both are equally entitled to the exemption.

'Rent' is defined in section 105 of the Transfer of Property Act as 'money, share of the crops, service, or any other thing of value to be rendered periodically or on specified occasions by the tenant to the landlord in consideration of the enjoyment of immoveable property'. The same idea pervades most of the definitions in Indian Tenancy Legislation. Rent implies the idea of a lessor and lessee or landlord and tenant. Revenue on the other hand is:

"the return, yield or profit of any lands, property or other important source of income; that which comes to one as a return from property or possessions, specially of an extensive kind; income from any source specially of an extensive kind; income from any source but specially when large and not directly earned".—Oxford Dictionary.

'Revenue' is ordinarily a word with a wider denotation than 'rent'. A possible distinction is that 'revenue' is income due to the State and 'rent' the income on account of the user of land due to the landlord, but in the context of the definition, 'revenue' may be held to refer to all income from land other than 'rent' and not falling under clause (b). See e.g., Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 1 (F.B.), in which certain illegal nazars received by a landlord were held to be revenue. See also Jhalak Prasad v. Bihar, 1941 I.T.R. 386 (under the Bihar Agricultural Income-tax Act).

A jagirdar who receives an assignment of revenue from lands whatever the tenure—is clearly in receipt of agricultural income. The Income-tax Manual also makes this clear. On the other hand a fixed malkhana in lieu of an extinguished right to income is not rent or revenue from land even though the malkhana may have been originally fixed at a percentage of the revenue. Raja Mustafa Ali Khan v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1945 I.T.R. 981 (Oudh).

Rent or Revenue—What may be included in.—It was decided by the Calcutta High Court in Maharaja Birendra Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Secretary of State for India in Council, 1 I.T.C. 67; 48 Cal. 766, that (1) the premium paid for the settlement of waste lands or abandoned holdings may reasonably be regarded as 'rent or revenue' derived from land within the meaning of clause (a), since the premium represented the capitalised value of a portion of the rent; and (2) illegal cesses exacted by landlords are not agricultural income and therefore not rent or revenue. The same ruling also decided that premium paid for recognition of a transfer of holding from one tenant to another was not rent and therefore not 'agricultural income', but the same High Court took a contrary view in a later Full Bench decision—Nawabzadi Meher Khanum and others v. Secretary of State, 2 I.T.C. 99; 53 Cal. 34 and this Full Bench ruling was followed in Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 158; 7 Pat. 550, by a Divisional Bench of the Patna High Court. A later Full Bench of the Patna High Court decided that mutation, etc., fees, whether legal or not, are agricultural income in so far as they arise from the land, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 1 (F.B.). This was followed in Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Manavikraman Raja, 1945 I.T.R. 174.

The following are not agricultural income: (1) Income derived from the use of land for storing purchases of crops by merchants, King-Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 31 C.W.N. 1047; A.I.R. 1927 Cal. 793; (2) Nazar paid by tenants at the beginning of the Zenindari year known as punyaha nazar—a voluntary payment paid on an auspicious day (31 C.W.N. 1047, supra) (the Full Bench ruling in Meher Bano Khanum's case, 2 I.T.C. 99; 53 Cal. 34, was distinguished on the ground that fees paid for the recognition of transfer of holdings were virtually commuted payments of rent); (3) Nazar paid for the recognition of succession, inheritance, etc., not in connection with the land or tenure held by the tenant, Emperor v. Probhat Chandra Barua, 106 I.C. 353; (4) Rent of site of a flour mill, Conville v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1936 Lah. 895; 1936 I.T.R. 137; (5) Lambardari fees, i.e., remuneration for collection of land revenue (Conville's case, supra); (6) commission received by a landlord from tenants for selling the latter's produce, Conville v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, supra; (7) Zar-i-Chaharun, received when a house is sold; (8) Nazrana received when a house is built Kunwar Bishwanath Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1942 I.T.R. 322.

The soundness of the distinction drawn above in regard to Punyaha Nazars was doubted by the Patna High Court in the case of Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo, cited above—see per Wort, J. The fact that the Nazars in Meher Bano Khanum's case were considered to be in effect capitalised rent, did not make other illegal Nazars cease to be revenue; and 'Revenue' is a wider term than 'Rent'.

In a certain locality where rent is paid in kind, the produce is weighed by a separate agency called Dharwais. A landlord, instead of allowing the tenants to have the weighment made by their Dharwais, insisted, as part of the agreement regulating the rent, on the weighment being made by a man of his own, whom he selected by auction, the man so selected being given the sole right to do the work and receive certain fixed rates of fees from the tenants. The question arose whether the premium received by the landlord from the sole weigher (minus certain expenses) was agricultural income and was answered in the affirmative, Probynabad Stud Farm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, A.I.R. 1936 Lah. 602; (1936) I.T.R. 114.

A subsidy in aid of cultivation of land will presumably be part of the revenue from the land, and be therefore agricultural if the land otherwise satisfies the conditions laid down in the definition in this sub-section; but the subsidy can be of a capital nature, i.e., for ploughing up new or abandoned land. Cf. Higgs v. Wrightson, 1944 K.B.D. (?)

As to whether premia paid for a lease generally are income or capital, see notes under section 3.

Rent—Interest on arrears of.—Interest on arrears of rent of land used for agricultural purposes is ordinarily part of the rent derived from the land and is therefore not liable to income-tax. If, however, the arrears are secured by a bond and are therefore recoverable by a civil suit, such interest is taxable (vide Income-tax Manual). This view was confirmed by the Madras High Court in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Zemindar of Kirlampudi, 55 M. 830; 63 M.L.J. 20; A.I.R. 1932 Mad. 436. The point is that the bond converts the liability for rent into a loan.

In In re Radhika Mohan Roy Ward's Estate, 1940 I.T.R. 460 (Cal.) it was held that interest on arrears of rent regulated by the Bengal Tenancy Act is not a part of the rent. Rent is paid for the use of land and interest for the use of money, viz., the rent payable; also the former arises out of a contract and the latter out of a statutory penalty. Therefore the interest was not agricultural income. This view was followed in the Madras case of Pethaperumal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1942 I.T.R. 532 and in the Calcutta case of D. P. Garga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1942 I.T.R. 546. Where, however, a lessee in consideration of the right to collect produce rents from tenants pays an annual sum to the landlord, that sum is 'rent', and the interest on arrears of such rent payable under the lease is part of such rent and therefore agricultural income, Sri Ramachandra Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1942 I.T.R. 141.

In Shrimati Lakshmi Daiji v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1944 I.T.R. 309, the Patna High Court reviewed all the authorities and definitely dissented from the decision in In re, Radhiki Mohan Roy's Estate. 'Interest' is only a relative idea involving the existence of a principal; and the source of the two cannot be different any more than that leaves and flowers spring from different sources. If the principal is agricultural income, it follows that interest also is such; a default cannot be a source of income.

The decision in Ramachandra Deo's case assumed that interest on arrears of rent is not rent, and did not canvass the question. Following Lakshmi Daiji's case the same High Court held in Zainuddin Hussan Mirza v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1944 I.T.R. 428, that even assuming that such interest was taxable a bond in place of the interest due is not the equivalent of income and therefore not taxable, not being cash or moneys worth but merely a security for debt. See also Bihar v. Dalip Narain Singh, 1945 I.T.R. 37, a case under the Bihar Agricultural Income-tax Act.

Business and agriculture.—The fact that income is held in a given case to arise from a "business" as defined in sections 2 (4) and 10 would not by itself negative its being 'agricultural income' as defined in this clause if it otherwise falls under it, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, (1939) I.T.R. 48 (P.C.). There is no inherent contradiction between 'agriculture' and 'business'. See also Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Sir Kameshwar Singh, 1935 I.T.R. 305; 14 Pat. 623 (P.C.).

Mixed occupations.—Where land which is partly agricultural and partly non-agricultural is leased for a lump rent, it is open to the Revenue to dissect the lump rent and tax the non-agricultural part thereof. See also per Fazl Ali, J., "the rent ought not to be taxed when it is shown that at the time of the lease, it was fixed on the basis of the agricultural income only and that the non-agricultural income was not taken into account." Rani Bhubaneswari v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1940 I.T.R. 551.

There is nothing to prevent a person from practising more than one trade or having more than one source of income, Egyptian Hotels, Ltd. v. Mitchell, (1915) A.C. 1022; 6 Tax Cases 542; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Ransom, 12 Tax Cases 21; (1918) 2 K.B. 709; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Maxse, 12 Tax Cases 41; (1919) 1 K.B. 647 (C.A.), and one of such businesses might be agricultural. Thus a Tea Company may not only cultivate and raise tea but manufacture it into a state fit for the market by applying processes not applied by the ordinary cultivator. Similarly a sugar refinery may not only have its own sugar plantations but also buy cane as well as crude sugar from other persons and with the assistance of the up-to-date machinery on a large scale prepare refined sugar. In the case of the Bhikanpur Sugar Concern, 53 I.C. 301; A.I.R. 1919 Pat. 377; 1 I.T.C. 29, the Patna High Court (Dawson Miller, C.J.) said:—

"The truth is, in my opinion, that the concern was really acting in a dual capacity. In so far as they were cultivators of sugarcane their operations ceased when they handed over the raw material to their factory branch. In so far as they were manufacturers of refined sugar, they were carrying on a business which required the adoption of manufacturing processes not ordinarily used by cultivators before disposing of their produce in the market. . . ."

In the Killing Valley Tea Company's case, 48 Cal. 161; A.I.R. 1921 Cal. 40; 1 I.T.C. 54, the Calcutta High Court found as below:—

"The earlier part of the operation when the tea bush is planted and the young green leaf is selected and plucked may well be deemed to be agriculture. But the later part of the process (i.e., the processes in an up-to-date large scale Tea Factory) is really manufacture of tea, and cannot, without violence to language, be described as agriculture." Both these rulings were given before Rules 23 and 24 were framed.

In the United Kingdom, it has been held that if land is used for purposes which are only partly agricultural, it is a question of fact how far the inter-connection of the operations makes the business a single one and is so an agricultural one. See Denning v. Hick, 19 Tax Cases 219 (K.B.D.) and Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Melross, 19 Tax Cases 607 (C.S.); (1935) S.C. 812; see also Bomford v. Osborne, (1939) 3 A.E.R. 259 (K.B.D.).

In respect of profits arising from quasi-agricultural operations, the following rules have been made by the Central Board of Revenue under section 59 (2) (a) (i).

Rule 23.—(1) In the case of income which is partially agricultural income as defined in section 2 and partially income chargeable to income-tax under the head "Business", in determining that part which is chargeable to Income-tax the market value of any agricultural produce which has been raised by the assessee or received by him as rent-in-kind and which has been utilized as raw material in such business or the sale of receipts of which are included in the accounts of the business shall be deducted; and no further deduction shall be made in respect of any expenditure incurred by the assessee as a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind.

(2) For the purposes of sub-rule (1) "market value" shall be deemed to be:—(a) Where agricultural produce is originally sold in the market in its raw state, or after application to it of any process ordinarily employed by a cultivator or receiver of rent in kind to render it fit to be taken to market, the value calculated according to the average price at which it has been so sold during the year previous to that in which the assessment is made; (b) where agricultural produce is not ordinarily sold in the market in its raw state, the aggregate of—(1) the expenses of cultivation; (2) the land revenue or rent paid for the area in which it was grown; and (3) such amount as the Income-tax Officer finds, having regard to all the circumstances in each case, to represent a reasonable rate of profit on the sale of the produce in question as agricultural produce.

Rule 24.—Income derived from the sale of tea grown and manufactured by the seller in British India shall be computed as if it were income derived from business, and 40 per cent. of such income shall be deemed to be income, profits and gains liable to tax:

Provided that in computing such income an allowance shall be made in respect of the cost of planting bushes in replacement of bushes that have died or become permanently useless in an area already planted unless such area has previously been abandoned.

Notes on Rule 23 (2), Clause (a).—The "average" price may be either the average of the prices at which the produce was sold by the cultivator or of those of the market generally. Presumably it means the latter for ex hypothesi the assessee must have used the whole or the greater part of his produce in the manufacture. Whether the produce is ordinarily sold in the market in its raw state or not, and what is the price at which it is sold are obviously questions of fact. On what basis the price is to be calculated is, however, a question of law.

"Market" is a vague expression, and all that the rule means here is that if, in practice, the produce has a sale value apart from the demand for the business of the assessee in question Rule 23 (2) (a) should be applied; otherwise Rule 23 (2) (b).

Notes on Rule 24.—The proviso was introduced in 1933.—As regards tea, when the person growing, manufacturing and selling tea has separate purely agricultural income, e.g., from rent or cultivation of land on which tea is not grown, it cannot be taken as his income in calculating the profits of the business. If a tea company grows tea seed for its own use the growing of tea seed must be included in the general business and 40 per cent. of the profits taxed; but if separate accounts are kept of receipts and expenditure for the growing of seed, the income from so much of the seed as is sold to third parties will be treated as agricultural.

Transfers of Tea Export Quotas.—Under section 15 of the Indian Tea Control Act, 1933, the owner of a tea estate may transfer his right to obtain export licences in whole or in part to any party. Where the quotas are transferred by the owner of a tea estate to which they appertain, the price realised should be treated as if it were income derived from the sale of tea grown and manufactured by the seller, and 40 per cent. of the income derived from the sale of the rights will be held liable to tax. Where, however, a further transfer is made by a person other than the owner of the tea estate to which the quota has been so allotted, whether or not such person is himself the owner of a tea estate to which another quota has been allotted, his profits on that transaction cannot in any sense be said to have resulted from the growth by him of tea and will have to be treated as wholly taxable in the assessment of the seller. The same applies to the profits made by an owner of a tea estate out of a transaction in which he buys a quota and uses it for the export of tea grown in an estate not in his own, e.g., after manufacturing tea in his factory from green tea grown elsewhere. If a quota is purchased by the owner of another tea estate and is utilized by him for the exportation of tea grown on his own estate, such purchase enables the purchaser to market the product of his own tea estate, and it follows that the cost of buying the quota will have to be debited to the income of the concern before apportionment under Rule 24 of the Indian Income-tax Rules. Where the quota is purchased by a person who is not the owner of a tea estate, or if purchased by the owner of a tea estate is resold by him, or is used by him for the export of tea grown on an estate not his own, the expenditure will be allowed in full in computing the purchaser's profits, since, as already explained, the net profits of such a person from the transaction are taxable in full. (Income-tax Manual.)

Expenses of Cultivation—Deductibility of.—A Rubber Company had an estate, of which in the year in question one-seventh only actually produced rubber, the other six-sevenths being in process of cultivation for the production of rubber, rubber trees not yielding rubber until they are about six years old. Expenditure for superintendence, weeding, etc., was incurred by the company in respect of the whole estate. Held, that in arriving at their assessable profits the company were entitled to deduct the expenditure for superintendence, weeding, etc., on the whole estate and not one-seventh of such expenditure only.

Per Lord President.—I think the proposition only needs to be stated to be upset by its own absurdity. It would mean this, that if your business is connected with a fruit which is not always ready precisely within the year of assessment you would never be allowed to deduct the necessary expenses without which you could not raise that fruit. This very case, which deals with a class of thing that takes six years to mature before you pluck or tap it, is a very good illustration, but of course without any ingenuity one could multiply cases by the score. Supposing a man conducted a milk business, it really comes to the limits of absurdity to suppose that he would not be allowed to charge for the keep of one of his cows because at a particular time of the year, towards the end of the year of assessment, that cow was not in milk, and therefore the profit which he was going to get from the cow would be outside the year of assessment the real point is, what are the profits and gains of the business? Now, it is quite true that in arriving at the profits or gains of business you are not entitled, simply because—for what are likely quite prudent reasons—you either consolidate your business by not paying the profits away or enter into new speculations or increase your plant and so on—you are not entitled on that account to say that what was a profit is a profit no more. The most obvious illustration of that is a sum carried to a reserve fund. It would be a perfectly prudent thing to do, but none the less if that sum is carried to a reserve fund out of profit it is still profit, and on that income-tax must be paid. But when you come to think of the expense in this particular case that is incurred for instance in the weeding which is necessary in order that a particular tree should bear rubber, how can it possibly be said that that is not a necessary expense for the rearing of the tree from which alone the profit eventually comes? And the Crown will not really be prejudiced by this, because when the tree comes to bear the whole produce will go to the credit side of the profit and loss account —Vallambrosa Rubber Co., Ltd. v. Farmer, 5 Tax Cases 529; 535; 47 Sc.L.R. 488.

As to how far income from rubber is agricultural, see below.

The above ruling, however, will not justify the cost of additional planting to be treated as revenue expenditure, only true revenue expenditure, e.g., weeding and manuring and draining or watering can be deducted from taxable income irrespective of whether particular bushes or trees yield taxable income in a particular year. It stands to reason that if expenditure on maintenance on particular blocks of trees or bushes is allowed as revenue expenditure receipts arising during the year from the corresponding bushes or trees should be included in the taxable income. Instructions on the above lines are to be found in the Income-tax Manual.

Rubber.—Income from rubber cultivation will be treated as agricultural income to the extent that the methods adopted in preparing the raw material for the market are those ordinarily employed by a cultivator. The legal position is that it is a question of fact how much of the income is agricultural (and therefore exempt from Income-tax) and how much not. In the absence of a rule specifying a percentage or profits to be taxed as in the case of tea, the profits should be worked out in each case in accordance with Rule 23.

Salt Pans.—In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Lingareddi, 50 Mad. 763; 2 I.T.C. 363, the Madras High Court held that the process of flooding land by letting in sea water, and then extracting sodium chloride by the elimination of other constituents, is not an agricultural purpose.

Sporting rights.—In the United Kingdom the value of sporting rights is charged on lands under Schedules A and B but it seems fairly clear that 'husbandry' does not include the leasing of 'sporting rights'. The charge in the United Kingdom under these two schedules is not on agricultural lands only. In India income from sporting rights would presumably not fall under clause (b) of the definition but it might arguably fall under clause (a) as 'revenue'.

Hore breeding.—In the United Kingdom fees derived from a stallion kept on a farm by serving outside mares were considered to be separate source of income from the farm, Malcolm v. Lockhart, 7 Tax Cases 99 (H.L.). See also McLaughlin v. Mrs. Blanche Bailey, 7 Tax Cases 508 and Wernher v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, 1942 I.T.R. 165 (Sup.). While in these cases the land was occupied as an ordinary farm and the use of the stallion was outside the purposes of the occupation the position in Lord Glaneley v. Wightman, 49 T.L.R. 356; 12 A.T.C. 209 (H.L.), was that the land was occupied as a stud farm and the stallion incidentally served outside mares also which were sent to the farm. It was held accordingly that the fees for serving outside mares need not be assessed as a separate source of income. The Irish case of McLaughlin v. Mrs. Blanche Bailey, 7 Tax Cases 508, was incidentally overruled, as having extended the principle of Malcolm v. Lockhart too far.

In another case, Earl of Derby v. Bassom, 5 A.T.C. 260; 42 T.L.R. 380 (H.L.), the assessee owned a racing establishment and a breeding stud at which he raised and trained a number of mares. He also bred several stallions which were first tested in the race course and then sent to the stud where they served the assessee's mares and were also let out to serve other mares. In order to prevent interbreeding the assessee also sometimes hired other stallions to serve his mares. The Commissioners found that the letting out of the stallions was a separate business and chargeable as a "Trade". Held, that there was evidence on which the Commissioners could arrive at the finding. In this case the assessee paid tax under Schedule B for the lands occupied by the stud. It has also been held that whether profits from racing and horsebreeding are sufficiently closely connected with the occupation of land is a question of fact, being one of degree and of evidence, Dawson v. Counsel, 16 A.T.C. 148 (K.B.).

It has been held in construing a United Kingdom statute which defined an "agricultural society" as "any society or institute established for the purpose of promoting the interests of agriculture, horticulture, livestock breeding or forestry" that "live stock" need not be restricted to animals whose use is an integral part of agriculture, horticulture or forestry and that it can include foxhounds, Peterborough Royal Foxhound Society v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 20 Tax Cases 249; (1936) 2 K.B. 497.

Poultry farming.—A poultry farm occupied 33 acres of land on which poultry were raised and a few sheep grazed. Most of the food for the poultry was brought from outside. Only half an acre of the land was cultivated for green food for winter feeding. The farm buildings served as incubating rooms and for storing food. Held, that having regard to the facts in this case the poultry farming was "husbandry".

Per the Lord President.—"I think it may be extracted from (the previous decisions) that lands are properly said to be occupied for 'husbandry' if the trade or business carried on by the occupier depends to a material extent on the industrial or commercial use of the fruits (natural or artificial) of the lands so occupied. I say 'to a material extent' because it is notorious that there are many agricultural farms in this country which depend to a large extent upon imported foodstuffs which are not and could not be produced on the lands of such farms."

Per Lord Cullen.—"The case is not one of a space having the character of a mere poultry yard used for housing and for artificial feeding and affording exercise to poultry but is one where the poultry derives sustenance to a material extent from the produce of the ground," Lean and Dickson v. Ball, 5 A.T.C. 7; 10 Tax Cases 341.

A poultry farmer occupied three acres of grass land on which he raised the poultry and grazed a couple of cows in summer and four sheep in winter. No part of the land was cultivated and the entire food for the poultry was brought from outside. It was argued by the Crown that the profits from the sale of the poultry and eggs were derived from a trade or business. Held by Rowlatt, J., following the above ruling, that the grass land on which the poultry were kept was used for husbandry.

"It seems to me that he is using the land as land. . . . The stock is not all kept in the same place in a yard and the mess cleared away; he moves them from place to place; they live to some extent upon the herbage and upon insects and other produce of the soil. He moves them about, the herbage springs up and the cow comes and eats it and so he works this little bit of land. . . ." Jones v. Nuttall, 5 A.T.C. 229; 10 Tax Cases 346; 42 T.L.R. 384.

It is a question of fact, i.e., one of degree and of evidence, whether profits from poultry farming are sufficiently closely connected with land, Long v. Belfield Poultry Products, Ltd. and Thoruber Bros., Ltd. v. McInnes, 16 A.T.C. 277 (K.B.). See also Lowe and Sons v. Commissioners of Indian Revenue, Sc. 21 Tax Cases 597.

Processes applied ordinarily by cultivators.—The test is whether the process employed to render the produce fit to be taken to the market is a process ordinarily employed by a cultivator or receiver of rent-in-kind. This is essentially a question of fact, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Katraguda Madhusudhana Rao, 1944 I.T.R. 1 depending, it would seem, on the locality, the crop, the magnitude of the holding, the organisation adopted, etc. Thus the husking of paddy is an agricultural operation, so is the preparation of gur or brown sugar, but not sugar refining or the milling of paddy. (See In re Bhikanpur Sugar Concern, 1 I.T.C. 29, already cited.) It has been held that drying and curing coffee, after picking the beans, are not manufacture but only processes ordinarily employed by the cultivator to render the produce fit to be taken to market, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, A.I.R. 1937 Mad. 745; (1937) 2 M.L.J. 310; (1937) I.T.R. 435. Similarly the cultivation and plucking of the tea plant is an agricultural operation but the manufacture of the leaves into a state fit for consumption, with the aid of up-to-date appliances on a large scale is not such an operation. (See In re Killing Valley Tea Company, 1 I.T.C. 54; 48 Cal. 161; A.I.R. 1921 Cal. 40 already cited.) In the same way the growing of cotton is an agricultural operation but not its ginning, Sheolal Ramlal v. Commissioner of Income-tax (C. P.), A.I.R. 1932 Nag. 61.

The word 'cultivator' means the person who 'cultivates', i.e., applies the process of agriculture. He need not cultivate with his own hands, but may hire others to do so, and the expression includes a firm or company. (See Killing Valley Company and Bhikanpur cases cited above.)

It is clear from the definition that an agricultural process does not necessarily stop short at the removal of the plant from the soil. To test whether a particular process applied to the produce is agricultural, it should be seen whether it would be ordinarily employed by a cultivator or receiver, of rent-in-kind to render the produce fit for the market. The "market" implies a real centre of economic exchange. Held, accordingly in a case in which there was no market except a jail which sometimes purchased raw aloes and no standard of comparison of processes ordinarily employed by cultivators, and the assessee cultivated aloe plants and prepared with the help of machinery the fibre which he sold, that the entire process including the preparation of the fibre was agricultural, J. M. Casey v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, A.I.R. 1930 Pat. 44; 9 Pat. 185.

Buildings.—Agricultural buildings are exempt from taxation only if (1) they are on or in the immediate vicinity of the land, (2) the receiver of rent or revenue or the cultivator, etc., requires as a dwelling house, store house or other out-buildings, and (3) so requires it because of his connection with the land. All these three conditions should be satisfied. The exemption of the building is on the notional income and not on the actual income, because unless the owner occupies the building, there can be no exemption; and if he occupies it, the income must be notional, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 1; 4 I.T.C. 15. This point however is not material since the income would be included neither in taxable income nor in total income.

Immediate Vicinity.—There are no decisions as to what constitutes "immediate vicinity". Zemindar's dwelling houses and kacheries have in practice been exempted; and the question of what constitutes "immediate vicinity" is one of fact, and it is not open to the assessee to claim a building to be a dwelling house, etc., without regard to facts, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 9 Pat. 1; 4 I.T.C. 15.

Connection with land.—In Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 7 Pat. 550; 3 I.T.C. 158, the Patna High Court ruled that a guest house which was really part of the landlord's dwelling house but built separately owing to custom was not taxable, the dwelling house itself being exempt from tax. In a later case, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 9 Pat. 1; 4 I.T.C. 15, in which this view was reaffirmed, it was argued by the Commissioner that 'requires' means 'needs' and that the words "by reason of his connection with the land" mean "for the purpose of agriculture—in the particular case that of collecting rent or revenue". It was held that the word 'requires' means that the assessee demands to appropriate the building for the purpose of a dwelling house, etc. The words "by reason of . . . land" merely explain the nature of the class of persons entitled to exemption. The verb 'requires' is separated by a comma from the grammatical subject and the phrase "by reason of . . . land," but the words "by reason of . . . land" are not separated by a comma or otherwise from the words "the receiver of the rent. . . .". The phrase "by reason of" has therefore a qualitative and not a quantitative significance. One cannot add the words "for agricultural purposes" to the statute so as to say that unless the building is required for such purposes, its value is not exempt.

It might be open to the Department to hold that a particular building because of its size or situation is not a building which the receiver of rent or revenue requires by reason of his connection with the land as a dwelling house, and in that case the entire value of the building could be taxed; but once you admit that the building is required you cannot allocate it between agricultural and non-agricultural purposes, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 9 Pat. 1; 4 I.T.C. 15.

Questions of law and fact.—Whether a particular income is agricultural or not is essentially a question of fact, Kokine Dairy v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, (1938) I.T.R. 145.

(2) “assessee” means a person by whom income-tax is payable;

Assessee.—Income-tax can become payable only after the liability to pay has been determined by the Income-tax Officer under section 23 or other appropriate section. Before such assessment, the person, it can be said, is not an assessee. The fact that the Income-tax Officer had wrongly determined the liability would however not make the person any the less an ‘assessee’. See section 30. Every person as defined in section 2 (9) and General Clauses Act, section 3 (39), can be an ‘assessee’. Under the latter ‘person’ includes any company or association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not.

In some sections, e.g., section 24, section 64, the word has not been used in the above sense, but in that of the person to be assessed which is its etymological meaning. Even in sections 7 to 16, the word is not used in the sense of the definition but in that of its ordinary meaning. It is only after computing a person’s income that his liability to tax can be determined.

In Gorind Saran v. Commissioner of Income-tax, A.I.R. 1927 Oudh 465; 2 I.T.C. 480, the Chief Court of Lucknow suggested that if the representative of a deceased person’s estate was an assessee for the purpose of liability to pay, he was also an assessee for the purpose of claiming a refund. In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Ellis Reid, 55 Bom. 312; A.I.R. 1931 Bom. 333; 5 I.T.C. 100, the Bombay High Court held that this definition in terms applied only to a living person. These rulings however have ceased to be of interest after the addition of section 24-B regarding the assessment of estates of deceased persons and section 49-F (formerly 49-B) regarding the grant of refund of tax to such estates.

Income-tax includes super-tax. See section 55, which defines super-tax as an ‘additional duty of income-tax’ and also section 58 which lays down which sections of the Act do not apply to super-tax.

The word ‘assessment’ is used in the Act, sometimes in the sense of determining the amount of profit or loss, sometimes in that of determining or levying tax, and sometimes with reference to the whole procedure for imposing liability and where there is nothing repugnant in the context it would seem to refer to the first, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. P. R. A. L. M. Muthukaruppa Chettiar, (1939) I.T.R. 29; Beharilal Chatterjee v. Commissioner of Income-tax, (1934) I.T.R. 377 (All.); Kunwar Bishwanath Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1942 I.T.R. 322 (All.).

There are really three stages in the levy and collection of tax, viz., the declaration of liability by a statute, the quantification of that liability by an assessment and the collection of the tax. See Whitney v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1926 A.C. 37; 10 Tax Cas. 88.

History.—In the 1886 Act there was no definition of ‘assessee’. In the 1918 Act the definition of ‘assessee’ was “a person by whom income-tax is payable and includes a firm and a Hindu undivided family.” In 1922 the Select Committee considered that the proper place to lay down liability, etc., was the charging section (section 3) and dropped the latter part of the 1918 definition.

Liability to tax of different kinds of assessee.—As regards the liability to tax, see sections 3 and 55—the charging sections for Income-tax and Super-tax respectively. Under section 3 income-tax is payable by every individual, Hindu undivided family, company, firm and other association of persons.

Firms—Partners of.—As to how far a firm is a separate assessee from its partners, see the remarks of Schwabe, C.J., in Commissioner of Income-tax v. M. Ar. Arunachalam Chetti, 47 Mad. 660; A.I.R. 1924 Mad. 474; 1 I.T.C. 278, in which he discussed the position of partners of firms with reference to claims to 'set-off' under section 24; also other connected rulings referred to under that section. The scheme of the Act as amended in 1939 seeks to tax partners of registered firms and not the firms as such except as a step in the process and to tax only unregistered firms as firms. See however section 23 (5) and section 2 (6-B).

With reference to the Madras Agricultural Debt Relief Act it has been held that a partner is assessed to income-tax when his firm is so assessed. Somappa v. Venkatrama Chetti, 1941 I.T.R. 289.

(3) "Appellate Assistant Commissioner" means a person appointed to be an Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax under section 5;

The word "Appellate" was inserted in 1939. Formerly there was only one class of Assistant Commissioners who discharged both appellate and inspecting functions. The two functions have been separated since 1st April, 1939.

See notes under section 5 as to how these Assistant Commissioners are appointed, their duties and powers under the Act, etc.

(4) "business" includes any trade, commerce, or manufacture or any adventure or concern in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture;

History.—The definition of "business" was first introduced in the Act of 1918. In the Act of 1886 incomes from this head fell under Part III—profits of Joint Stock Companies or Part IV—"other income", as the case may be.

Business.—The definition of "business" in the Indian law is perhaps slightly wider than the corresponding definition of "trade" in the English law, in which the word "business" has not been used. "Trade" has been defined in the English Income-tax Act, 1918, as "including every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade."

"Includes".—Under the Excess Profits Duty Act the definition of business was identical with the definition in the present Income-tax Act, and it was argued on behalf of the Crown in the Royal Calcutta Turf Club v. Secretary of State, that the definition was not exhaustive but the point was not decided. Attention was drawn to other definitions in the Act in which the word "means" was used when an exhaustive definition was contemplated. See also Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. National Mutual Association of Australasia, 57 Bom. 519; A.I.R. 1933 Bom. 42; 1933 I.T.R. 351 where also it was observed that the definition is not exhaustive.

"Business" has a more extensive meaning than the word 'trade', Harris v. Amery, 35 L.J.C.P. 92; L.R. 1 C.P. 148, but ordinarily speaking

'business' is synonymous with 'trade', Delany v. Delany, 15 L.R.I.V. 67. In Smith v. Anderson, 50 L.J. Ch. 43; 15 Ch.D. 258, Jessel, M.R., after citing definitions of 'business' from several dictionaries said "anything which occupies the time and attention and labour of a man for the purpose of profit is business." Further on he remarks:—

"There are many things which in common colloquial English would not be called a business when carried on by a single person, which would be so called when carried on by a number of persons. For instance a man, who is the owner of a house divided into several floors, if used for commercial purposes, e.g., offices, would not be said to carry on a business because he let the offices as such. But suppose a company was formed for the purpose of buying a building or leasing a house to be divided into offices and to be let out—should we not say if that was the object of the company that the company was carrying on business for the purpose of letting offices? The same observation may be made as regards a single individual buying or selling land with this addition that he may make it a business and then it is a question of continuity. When you come to an association or company formed for a purpose, you will say at once that it is a business because there you have that from which you would infer continuity. So in the ordinary case of investments a man who has money to invest, the object being to obtain his income, invests his money and he may occasionally sell the investments and buy others but he is not carrying on a business". (Stroud.)

(This portion of the decision was not affected though it was reversed on appeal; but the decision was with reference to the English Companies Act and not for income-tax purposes.) But there may be a business without pecuniary profit being at all contemplated. In this sense 'business' is a much larger word than 'trade', Rolls v. Miller, 53 L.J.Ch. 101. The keeping of a lodging house, for instance, would be a 'business'. A covenant not to permit the carrying on of any 'trade' or business' was held to be broken by allowing the premises to be used as an out-patient's branch of a hospital, Bramwell v. Lacy, 10 Ch.D. 591. In interpreting a restrictive covenant it was held that a Boy's School constituted 'business' Kemp v. Sober, 20 L.J.Ch. 602. These rulings, however, scarcely affect Income-tax Law which is concerned only with such 'business' as yields profits. It has been held that a Council of Law Reporting, for instance, carried on if not 'trade' certainly 'business', 58 L.J.Q.B. 90. On the other hand there may be a sequence of acts from which profit is anticipated without a 'business' being constituted. Thus, where a Barrister occupying a house and 79 acres of land as a private residence, which he had originally taken for pleasure, used some of the land for breeding cattle and horses and raising vegetables, fruits and flowers which he sold and he also occasionally bought and sold cattle and horses it was held on the evidence that he did not carry on 'business', Re Wallis: Ex parte Sully, 14 Q.B.D. 950. (This decision, however, was given under the Bankruptcy Act.) But there may be a business without any sequence of acts for "if an isolated transaction, which if repeated would be a transaction in a business, is proved to have been undertaken with the intent that it should be the part of several transactions in the carrying on of a business, then it is a first transaction in an existing business", Re Giffin, 60 L.J.Q.B. 235. (This again was under the Bankruptcy Act.) In Re Kaladan Suratee Bazar, 58 I.C. 914; 1 I.T.C. 50 a case under the Excess Profits Duty Act, the Rangoon Chief Court held that where a registered limited company owned house property consisting of stalls and tenements let out for rents and distributed the rents collected as dividends to its shareholders it was not carrying on a "business" (defined exactly as in the present definition).

Though where in fact there is business e.g., systematic and organised purchases and sales or manufacture the question of motive or desire to make profit is not relevant and the business is liable to tax if in fact it makes a profit (Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting, 3 Tax Cas 105; Royal Agricultural Society v. Wilson, 9 Tax Cas. 62), an important and often conclusive criterion, in doubtful cases, as to whether or not particular operations or transactions constitute a business is very often the motive to make a profit.

An important point to be remembered in distinguishing 'business' for income-tax purposes from 'business' for other purposes, e.g., under the Partnership or Bankruptcy Acts, is that under the Income-tax Act 'business' does not include a profession; a partnership is possible between two or more professional persons but such a partnership would not be treated as a 'business' under the Income-tax Act. "Business", under the Indian Partnership Act, "includes every trade, occupation and profession."

According to the Madras High Court, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Bosotto Bros., 1940 I.T.R. 41, the word 'business' denotes something abstract and intangible, apart from physical adjuncts and also apart from goodwill, reputation and connections.

Trade.—"Trade" in its largest sense is the business of selling, with a view to profit, goods which the trader has either manufactured or himself purchased.—Per Lord Davey in Grainger v. Gough, (1896) A.C. 345; 3 Tax Cases 462.

Buying in itself does not constitute a "trade". Unless the selling also is taken into account there are no profits.—See per Lord Watson, ibid.

"I do not think there is any principle of law which lays down what carrying on trade is. There are a multitude of things which together make up the carrying on of a trade but I know of no one distinguishing incident which makes a practice a carrying on of trade and another practice not a carrying on a trade. If I may use the expression, it is a compound fact made up of a variety of incidents."—Per Jessel, M.R. in Erichsen v. Last, 4 Tax Cases 422; 8 Q.B.D. 414.

"When a person habitually does and contracts to do a thing capable of producing profit and for the purpose of producing profit he carries on a trade or business".—Per Cotton, L.J., quoted with approval by Esher, M.R. in Werle v. Colquhoun, 2 Tax Cases 402; 20 Q.B.D. 753.

It is not possible to lay down definite lines to mark out what is a business or trade or adventure and to define the distinctive characteristics of each; nor is it necessary or wise to do so. The facts in each case may be very different and it is the facts that establish the nature of the enterprise embarked upon.—Per the M.R. Pollock, M.R. in Martin v. Lowry, 5 A.T.C. 11; 11 Tax Cases 297.

Taking into account the ordinary occupation of the appellant, the subject-matter of his purchase and sale, the method adopted for disposal, the number of operations and the period occupied, there is ample evidence to support the findings of the Commissioners that the appellant carried on a trade.—Per Atkin, L.J., ibid.

A series of retail purchases followed by one bulk sale or a single bulk purchase followed by a series of retail sales may well constitute a trade.—Per Sargant, L.J., ibid.

It is possible that, while each independent transaction may not by itself constitute a trade, i.e., other persons sharing in the profits will not be liable to tax on the ground that the profits to them were casual, the transactions taken together may constitute a trade by the person common to all the transactions. Thus a person, who bought, liquidated and reconstructed a number of companies, the persons working with him and sharing the profits being different in each transaction, was held to carry on a trade, though the other persons were not so held, Pickford v. Quirke, 44 T.L.R. 15; 13 Tax Cases 251 (C.A.). See Lowry v. Field, 20 Tax Cases 679 and also other decisions set out under section 3 (capital receipts) and section 4 (3) (vii) (casual profits).

In determining whether a case is one of trade or of investment, all the relevant facts have to be considered, e.g., the nature of the assets bought and sold; the circumstances of purchase and sale; the duration of ownership of the assets, the vocation of the tax-payer; the number of transactions of purchase and sale; if the assessee is a company, its memorandum and articles, etc. In other words, the existence—or not—of business (or trade) is primarily a question of fact. The question of law that usually arises is therefore whether there is evidence for the finding of fact, Thakor Datt Sharma, etc. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1939) I.T.R. 154.

Obviously no man can trade with himself and it follows therefore that several persons whose interest in a transaction are identical cannot be held to "trade" among themselves, e.g., members of mutual societies, etc., in respect of transactions among themselves, Dublin Corporation v. McAdam, 2 Tax Cases 387; L.R. Ir. 20 Ex. Div. 497. The definition in section 2 (6-C) of the Indian Act which seeks to tax mutual insurance associations and section 10 (6) which similarly seeks to tax profits on services rendered by trade, etc., associations are exceptions to this general principle.

"Commerce" is 'traffic, trade or merchandise in buying and selling of goods.' (Stroud.)

"Manufacture".—No mere philosophical or abstract principle can answer to the word 'manufacture'. Something of a corporal and substantial nature, something that can be made by man from the matters subject to his art and skill, or at the least some new mode of employing practically his art and skill, is required to satisfy the word, Vf. Gibson v. Brand, 4 M. & G. 199; 11 L.J.C.P. 177. (Stroud.)

"To work up (material) into forms suitable for use"—(Murray's new English Dictionary). "The operation of reducing raw materials into a form suitable for use by more or less complicated processes."—(Annandale's Concise English Dictionary). "To make from raw materials by any means into a form suitable for use"—(Chamber's Twentieth Century Dictionary.)

Manufacture can be easily distinguished from Trade and Commerce, but it is difficult to distinguish inter se between the latter. But the distinction is of no consequence as the definition of 'business' includes both and there is no provision in this Act with reference to which it is necessary to distinguish between the two.

Continuity.—While the words used in this definition are wide, underlying each of them is the fundamental idea of the continuous exercise of an activity. Taxable income must be profit earned by a process of production of income, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Shaw Wallace & Co., 63 M.L.J. 124; 5 I.T.C. 211; 59 I.A. 206 (P.C.). Carrying on business can only exist where there is a succession of acts or a continuity of transactions or acts; the performance of a single act apart from special circumstances is not enough even though it may result in gains or profits, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Currimbhoy Ebrahim & Sons, Ltd., (1933) I.T.R. 341; 57 Bom. 651; A.I.R. 1933 Bom. 422. See however notes on "Isolated transactions" under section 4 (3) (vii).

"Adventure or concern in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture."—These words are used to bring into the net transactions of a somewhat doubtful nature. The word "adventure" connotes the idea of 'risk', however remote, which almost every transaction made for profit bears. The word 'concern' implies a certain element of continuity and a certain degree of organisation though, as will be seen from the rulings referred to later, repetition of transactions is not always necessary. The essential features in the nature of trade, commerce or manufacture are (1) an element of profit—involving buying and selling, (2) such profit ordinarily being the purpose of the transaction, and (3) a certain degree of continuity—actual or possible; but all these features need not exist together. See notes under section 3 (distinction between Capital and Income) and under section 4 (3) (vii) (casual receipts not arising from a business). Mere investments in securities or shares, even if regularly made, do not constitute business, Forbes v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 6 I.T.C. 208.

The cases which have been before the Courts—and there have been many—fall broadly into four categories:—

(1) Single transactions—See Martin v. Lowry, 11 Tax Cases 297 (H.L.) and other cases under section 4 (3) (vii).

(2) Quiescent ownership—Inland Revenue v. South Behar Ranky, 12 Tax Cases 657 and other cases referred to below.

(3) Winding up or realising assets, including cases of executors and liquidators—See cases referred to below.

(4) Mutual concerns—See notes under section 3. It cannot be too often repeated that there is no clear formula as to what constitutes 'trade' or 'commerce' etc., and it is a question of fact in every case whether the activities constitute a 'business'.

"In the nature of Trade, etc."—In Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company v. Bennet, (1913) A.C. 610; 6 Tax Cases 327 it was held that the words "in the nature of trade" used in the definition qualified only 'concern' and not 'adventure'; therefore the entire business of an Insurance Company was its 'adventure', though a part of its business was that of making investments as an ancillary to its main business. This question arose with reference to the question whether the company should be taxed in the United Kingdom on the whole of its profits wherever arising whether remitted to the United Kingdom or not.

Destination of profits—Not relevant.—Whether an adventure or concern is a business or not is not affected by how its profits are ultimately disposed of, Trustees of Psalms and Hymns v. Whitewell, 3 Tax Cases 7; Religious Tract and Book Society v. Forbes, 3 Tax Cases 415; Grove v. Y. M. C. A., 4 Tax Cases 613; Mersey Docks v. Lucas, 2 Tax Cases 25; 8 App. Cas. 891; Governors of the Rotunda Hospital v. Coman, (1921) 1 A. C. 1; 7 Tax Cases 517.

Advances.—In course of business.—A company in the course of a wool-broking business, granted temporary advances on the security of second mortgages, or on wool and produce. The advances fluctuated in amount as the produce was realised. Held, that the interest from the advances was profits of a trade and not interest from investments even though some of them were secured by real property.

Per the Lord President.—"The sort of trade in which they are engaged is partly the trade of a broker, and partly the trade of a banker . . . not at all of the nature of investments of money. On the contrary, the advances are of the most irregular and fluctuating description. . . . this is proper trading and nothing else, and not investment of money upon securities." (Scottish Mortgage Company v. McKelvie, 2 Tax Cases 165 and Smiles v. Northern Investment Company, 2 Tax Cases 177, distinguished); Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, 2 Tax Cases 367.

House Property—Profits from.—A company invested its capital in house property and kept an office and a staff of collectors for the collection of rents and for letting out the property. Held, that it was not carrying on business. The ratio decidendi was that though it was an association for acquiring gain, its method was passive by owning property and not active by carrying on business. In re Kaladan Suratte Bazaar Co., 1 I.T.C. 50, a case under the Excess Profits Duty Act, section 2, of which defined 'business' in exactly the same way as the present Income-tax Act. But see Smith v. Anderson, 50 L.J.Ch. 43. Under the Income-tax Act the profits in question would be taxable as income from 'property'.—See notes under section 9.

Moneylender taking over properties.—In RM. P. RM. P. Valliappan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 49, it was held that income abroad from properties and rubber estates taken over in the course of foreign money-lending business is income from business. This decision given with reference to Excess Profits Tax applies to income-tax also. See also A. S. P. L. V. R. Ramasami Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1933 I.T.R. 389; 57 Mad. 22 (income from house property abroad); Ponnuiswami Pillai v. Ditto (income from tea estate abroad), 3 I.T.C. 378; S. N. A. S. A. Annamalai Chettiar v. Ditto, 1944 I.T.R. 254 (this did not overrule 1933 I.T.R. 389 but merely decided that, after 1939, income from foreign house property is to be computed with reference to section 9 even if the income is from a business).

Inventor—Director—Company promoter—Whether carrying on business.—An assessee had for many years been an inventor and had been granted nearly four hundred patents. Of these he had only sold one, and that was twenty-five years before the period of assessment in question. He was managing director of a company which worked some of his patents and paid him a fixed salary and commission dependent on results; and he was also managing director of, and principal shareholder in, another company of which he was the promoter and which paid him royalties on non-exclusive licences in respect of some of his patents granted by him to the company. He was also a director of several other manufacturing companies. Held, that he was not carrying on a trade or business (a case under the Excess Profits Duty Act).

Per Rowlatt, J.— The (assessee) is managing director of a company: that is not, nor is being a shareholder, carrying on a business.

He is also an owner of royalties. That again is not carrying on business. But those are the whole sources of his income. It is true that he is adding to his royalties, and he is performing his duties of managing director of the company and it may be very advantageous that he has those positions—that he has that particular form of property and is creating more, but I do not think those matters can be added together and that it can be said, in what I cannot help describing as a loose way, “Look at the general position”. I think the (assessee’s) position must be dissected and what his income is really derived from must be ascertained. In my judgment it is derived from those three distinct sources, and he is not, in respect of each or all of them put together, deriving this royalty income from a business.....

It is said if a person habitually invents, or habitually paints pictures or habitually writes books, with a view to gain from the patents when he has taken them out, the books which he has written and the pictures which he has painted, that is carrying on a business, and I feel a little difficulty about it. Very possibly if a person habitually paints a number of pictures year after year and sells them, it would be said that he was carrying on a business. He might be a professional man, but that is another matter. If he was writing books habitually year after year and carrying on a business I suppose he would be assessable under Schedule D in respect of it. If he was inventing patentable devices year after year and selling them and gaining an income, it would be difficult perhaps to say that he was not carrying on a business—I do not know whether that could be said—and if he kept on developing land and selling year after year he would be carrying on a business. On the other hand (Counsel for assessee) asks, “Supposing he has land and keeps on building on it and never sells it at all but has rent from the houses that he builds, is he carrying on a business?” One cannot help feeling that the answer to that question must be “No,” because he is merely investing his money in new property and keeping it; he is not dealing with it in any way.

Now the (assessee) does not sell his patents. He sold one twenty-five years ago, but it is quite clear that that is not the way in which he deals with the produce of his inventive ability. He simply keeps on inventing things and keeping the patent in his own hands, making what he can out of it by granting licences, just as a man builds a house and makes something out of it by letting it. Of course a painter cannot, as things are, do otherwise than sell his picture. An author is more like an inventor, because he can grant licences under royalties..... unless it can be shown that the property called into existence by the invention, or by the painting, is sold so as to obtain a money return against it, no evidence is produced that the inventor or the artist is carrying on a business. If the artist or the inventor sells the product of his ability, in many cases inquiry would have to be made whether he does so habitually as to bring him within the category of persons who carry on a business, but if he does not sell at all I do not think there is any evidence in support of the contention that he carries on a business.

It is said, for the Crown, that by granting these licences the (assessee) is putting his patent on the market. So he is, but so is the man who builds a house and lets it. It seems to me that carrying on a business involves, in a case like this, the disposal of the article which is produced as opposed to retaining it as a valuable thing in itself which can be treated as an investment, just as anything bought with the money obtained for it if it had been sold could be treated as an investment. On those grounds I think that the (assessee) cannot be regarded as carrying on a business.

I think it better not to say anything upon the question whether if I had held, he was carrying on a business, I should have held that his business was a profession.....Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Sangster, (1920) 1 K.B. 587; 12 Tax Cases 208.

When a business commences.—The question when a trade commences is one of fact, to be settled with reference to all the relevant evidence. Neither the date of registration of a company nor the date of a vending agreement is conclusive Todd v. Jones. 15 Tax Cas. 396. A coal company formed in 1906 started sinking pit shafts soon but there was little or no output of coal till 1912. The question arose with reference to Excess Profits Duty whether in 1914 the business had existed for more than three years, and the answer was given in the affirmative, Cannop Coal Co v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cas. 31. A company was registered in June, 1913 but no plant or machinery was set up till October when production also began. Held that the business did not start before October. Birmingham and District Cattle Byproducts v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cas. 92.

A company was formed in 1912 to take over an existing business. The company was unsuccessful, and, during 1913/1914, it got no new order, but merely completed the pending orders of the old business. In 1914, the Government took over the works of the company. In 1918, after the war, the company tried again to get contracts and failed. There was a new arrangement for finance in 1920, and new contracts were obtained. The Special Commissioners held that there was no business between 1914 and 1920 and that a new business began in 1920. The Courts held on the other hand that the business had continued all along and that in 1920 there was only an extension of the company's activities. Kirk and Randal v. Dunn, 8 Tax Cas. 663. See also cases referred to under sections 25 and 26 in connection with 'Discontinuance' and 'Succession' where the question often arises whether a new business is set up or not.

Business—One or many—Fact.—Whether a business is one or many is a question of fact, Birt, Potter and Hughes v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 6 A.T.C. 237; 12 Tax Cases 976; South Indian Industrials, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1935 I.T.R. 11; 58 Mad. 433; 8 I.T.C. 128. On this may depend important issues, e.g., the right of carry forward of losses under section 24 (2), whether particular profits arise from business or otherwise (very important when profits arise from isolated transactions of a speculative nature or from mere appreciation of capital) questions of succession and discontinuance, all of which are questions of fact. There is nothing (in the taxation acts) to prevent a person carrying on more than one business or exercising more than one profession, Gloucester Railway Carriage Co v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1925) A.C. 469; 12 Tax Cases 720; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Maxse (Magazine Editor and Owner), 12 Tax Cas. 41; Ditto v. Ransom (growing herbs and manufacturing chemicals) 12 Tax Cas. 21; Egyptian Hotels v. Michell, 6 Tax Cas. 452. See also the cases referred to under 'Mixed Occupations' under section 2 (1). Agricultural income, supra. As to the multiplicity of business being a question of fact, see Gloucester Railway Carriage Co v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1925) A.C. 469; 12 Tax Cases 720; Spiers & Son, Ltd. v. Ogden, 17 Tax Cases 117. Whether particular operations constitute a mere extension of an existing business or create a new and separate business is a question of fact. Where a cinema company bought other cinemas and sold some of them, keeping separate accounts for each, it was held that there was more than one business. H. and G. Kinemas, Ltd. v. Cock, 12 A.T.C. 300; 18 Tax Cases 116.

In Farrell v. Sunderland Steamship Company, 4 Tax Cases 605, it was held that the business of a whole ship which the company owned was a separate trade from that of another ship in which the company owned only a share. As already stated, however, such questions are primarily questions of fact. See also St. Aubyn Estates v. Strick, 12 A.T.C. 31; 17 Tax Cases 412.

The question whether particular transactions constitute a business or not being one of fact, the Courts will not interfere with the findings of fact by the Income-tax authorities or the Appellate Tribunal, so long as there is evidence for the findings. In re R. H. Mody, 1940 I.T.R. 179 (Bom.); Seth Mathra Prasad v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1941 I.T.R. 244. There is little doubt however, that questions of law will arise as to whether the proof of certain facts is sufficient to indicate the existence of a business. Sri Hardeo Bengal Salt Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1942 I.T.R. 13.

Business—Question of fact.—As to the extent to which the existence of a 'business' is a question of fact and how the Income-tax Officers should give their findings, see per Justice Rowlatt in Mellor v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 3 A.T.C. 659, quoted below:

"The question is whether the profits made by the financial operation in regard to these two mills and the stock was a profit of his stock-broker's business. Now, it does not appear that he is found to be a stock-dealer. That is the first difficulty. In paragraph 2 it is stated that he bought shares sometimes not knowing whether he would sell them again, and not having an immediate purchaser for them, and that he sometimes resold them if he found a purchaser, and he kept them if he did not, and so on. It does not state whether he was doing that as a stock-dealer or whether he was doing that as any person with a fancy for playing with investments might do. It does not appear that he sold them as a stock-broker to his clients, or that he sold them in any market where he operated as a stock-dealer. It is quite vague. It is only thrown in as a sort of argument; it is thrown in argumentatively, and I do not find that there is any finding in this case that he really was a stock-dealer. That question is not faced.

"Then, further, I do not think there is any finding that these profits or gains were the profits or gains of the business assessed, which is called stock-broking. One of the contentions set out is that the business ought to be dissected, and these profits ought to be separated from the stock-broker's business. That is certainly an argument. How is it dealt with? There are really only three findings in the case. One is that it is not an isolated transaction; the second is that it is not an investment; and, third, that it is done for the purpose of gain.

"Now the Attorney-General says that reading that with the form of the assessment and the contentions, the result is that the Commissioners have found that the profits were those of a stock-broking business. But I do not think so. It seems to me that the tribunal in a case like this must be made to find the very fact in dispute; they must find that it is part of the stock-broker's business.

"Now, if this gentleman had dealt in furniture or in pigs or in horses outside his business, all these questions would have been answered in precisely the same way. The argument would have been that it is not part of the stock-broker's business and ought to be dissected. That argument is stated here. The Commissioners find that it is not an isolated transaction. That would be also true in the other case. They also find that it is done for the purpose of gain. That is also true. They also find that it is not an investment. That is also true. But that is all that is found in this case.

"It seems to me it would be very dangerous indeed to allow tribunals, whether they are Income-tax Commissioners or juries or anybody else, not to face the real issue, but to find a person liable upon a series of conclusions upon matters of argument which throw light upon the question, and then, merely because they have found for one side, to say that they necessarily must have found all the things to which they ought to have addressed their minds, the question being whether they did do so or not.

"I think the case must go back to the Commissioners to say whether or not in terms these profits were the profits of the stock-broking business....."

"The question of what is the business of the company is apparently a pure question of fact and the matter is one which is for the revenue authorities and the revenue authorities alone."—Per Robinson, C.J., in Ahlonc Land Company v. Secretary of State for India, 67 I.C. 633; A.I.R. 1922 L.B. 35; 1 I.T.C. 167. See also Currie v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 12 Tax Cases 245 (C.A.); (1921) 2 K.B. 332 and Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 12 Tax Cases 358 (C.A.); (1921) 2 K.B. 403, which were followed in the above case and are referred to under sections 66 and 4 (3) (vii), infra.

An extreme exposition of this principle that the carrying on of a business is a question of fact was given in Edwards v. Old Bushmills Distillery Coy., 10 Tax Cases 285, in which a company went into liquidation in August, 1920 and in order to sell the business as a going concern the liquidator continued distilling but on a reduced scale. The distillery was put up for sale in March, 1921, but was not sold as no purchasers offered. For the year ending 5th April, 1921, the liquidator, i.e., the company, was assessed to income-tax. The Special Commissioners upheld the assessment but the Recorder of Belfast cancelled it on the ground that the receipts were capital received in the course of winding up. For the year ending 5th April, 1922, the company was again assessed to income-tax. The company appealed and the Special Commissioners cancelled the assessment as they felt bound by the decision of the Recorder. The Crown appealed and it was finally decided by the House of Lords (approving the decisions of the Court of Appeal and the K. B. Division for Northern Ireland) that the case should be sent back to the Commissioners to find on the facts, independently of the Recorder's decision for 1920-21, whether a business had been carried on in 1921-22. See also Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Old Bushmills Distillery (in liquidation), 12 Tax Cases 1148.

Consulting Engineer—Fees—When treated as income from business.—A skilled engineer acted both as consulting engineer and as an inventor. As a consulting engineer he advised his clients to instal new machinery the orders for which were placed through him. In supplying his clients with the machinery he charged them an inclusive price which covered three items, viz., (1) a merchant's profit to himself for getting the machinery, (2) an engineer's fee for his advice, and (3) he also arranged that machinery under his patents was to some extent provided. He claimed that deductions should be made on account of item (2) in assessing him to Excess Profits Duty on the ground that they were not profits from business. Held by the Court of Appeal that the assessee was not carrying on a profession but was carrying on a merchant's business in which he incidentally brought his professional skill to bear, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Marx, 4 A.T.C. 467.

See also the Excess Profits Duty cases referred to under section 10 as to the distinction between 'Business' and 'Profession'.

Executors—Carrying on business—Whether taxable.—"Executors may not trade as a general rule but . . . they may do certain things which are, from other points of view, trading without offending against the prohibition that they may not trade; that is to say, they may trade to the extent of winding up the business they find left to them by the testator." Per Rowlatt, J., The Executors of E. A. Cohan v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 602; 131 L.T. 377. But it was held by the Court of Appeal on the particular facts of the case that there was no trade. Per the M. of R.:—"It seems to me that the evidence shows that the executors only dealt with the business, only handled the business for the purpose of securing the proper advantage to the estate of the testator. . . . Of course it is largely a question of degree as to whether or not a business is being carried on by the executors for their own purposes or not." (ibid.)

This does not, however, mean that, if all that is done is merely to wind up in the best manner, there is no trade; that question has to be determined on the facts of each case. Three partners who traded in land promoted a company which built houses on land owned by the partnership, sold the houses and paid the partnership for the land. Two of the partners died, and their executors thought that in respect of certain land on which the company had already laid sewers and roads, the best method of realising the assets was to let the company construct the houses. There was no provision in the will permitting the executors to trade, and it was held on the facts that the executors did not trade, Executors of Marshall and Hood; Rogers v. Joly, 20 Tax Cas. 256; (1936) 1 All.E.R. 851. On the other hand where a syndicate of four individuals dealt in land and one of them died and the executor allowed the transactions to continue, the Commissioners held on the evidence and particularly the frequency of the transactions that there was a trade and the Court declined to interfere, Newbarns Syndicate v. Hay, 17 A.T.C. 308 (K.B.).

An individual sold his business to a private company on terms inter alia, that (1) all orders remaining unexecuted on the date of sale shall be executed by the company as agent for the vendor who would receive three fourths of the gross profits or commissions, and (2) the company shall collect on behalf of the vendor all the book or other debts in connection with the business reserved by the agreement for the vendor and excluded from the sale. The individual died sometime after and it was held that what the executor received from the company was income from a new business set up by the deceased through the company and not instalments of capital. Southern v. Cohen's executors, 23 Tax Cases 566 (C.A.).

Liquidators.—A liquidator is not like a trustee in bankruptcy; he is eodem persona cum defuncto. Therefore, even if he does not trade, if he receives monies representing profits before liquidation started, such profits can be taxed in his hands, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Oban Distillery (in liquidation), 18 Tax Cas. 33; 1933 S.C. 44; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Dailuaine Talisker Distilleries, 15 Tax Cas. 163; 1930 S.C. 878.

A trustee liquidating an insolvent firm of spinners continued to supply steam power at a profit to certain lessees and others. It was contended that as he did not carry on any other part of the firm's business and that as the supply of power was being made in order to assist the realisation of the assets to the best advantage the profits were not from trade but an accidental result from the liquidation of a previous loss. Held, that the supply of power was a trade and that the profits therefrom were taxable, Armitage v. Moore, (1900) 2 Q.B. 363; 4 Tax Cas. 199.

A company (with a small—share capital—£2,500) acquired certain valuable rights for a small sum (£2,500) and its members arranged to sell all their shares at £20 per £1 share. An advance of £13,500 was received but the transaction fell through. A suit followed and was compromised on the footing that the company was to go into liquidation, that a part of the rights originally arranged to be sold was to be given to the purchasers for £20,000 and that the £13,500 was to be taken as an advance on this account. The balance of £6,500 was also paid and the question arose whether this £20,000 was taxable in the hands of the liquidator. It was held that there was no evidence to justify a finding that the liquidator carried on a trade. He merely realised the assets, paid off the liabilities, and the balance to the shareholders. The fact that the company had power to sell a part of the undertaking was in itself of no significance since such a power was provided for as a matter of routine in almost every company's memorandum. The fact that the transaction would have been a trading one if made by the company did not necessarily convert it into one in the hands of the liquidator, Wilson Box (Foreign Rights) in Liquidation v. Brice, 20 Tax Cas. 736 (C. A.); 156 L.T. 24; (1936) 3 All.E.R. 728.

Where a film company on liquidation sold its rights in current films to certain other companies (from which it had originally bought its assets) and the latter companies exploited the rights and paid a substantial share (80 to 90 per cent.) of the takings reserving the balance for themselves in return for their services, it was held that the liquidator carried on a trade, Baker, Liquidator of First National Pictures, Ltd. v. Cook, 16 A.T.C. 248 (K.B.D.). Prima facie, the sale by a liquidator of the whole undertaking of a company would result in a capital asset but if the liquidation and the sale by the liquidator are parts of an original scheme of profit-making, the receipt would be income. It is all a matter of evidence in each case. Rhodesia Metals, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Taxes, 1941 I.T.R. (Supp.) 45 (P.C.).

Winding up of partnership.—Where a partnership had been dissolved and arrangements were made merely to receive goods already contracted for (paying the cost and other expenses) and deliver goods already sold (receiving the price) it was held by Rowlatt, J., that there was no trade. Buying and selling are an essential element of trade; and once this has been done, all that remains is the mechanical operation of working out the books so to speak. This view however was rejected by the Court of Appeal who considered the case scarcely different from one in which, instead of dissolving the partnership, the partners, because of slack trade, decided not to enter into further commitments till conditions improved, Hillerns and Fowler v. Murray, 17 Tax Cases 77; 48 T.L.R. 213.

Outstanding on close of business.—See Southern v. Cohen's 23 Tax Cases 566 (C.A.), referred to above, and also Bennett v. Ogston, 15 Tax Cases 374, referred to under section 12. In Parker v. Batty, 1942 I.T.R. (Supp.) 62, it was held, following Southern v. Cohen's Executors, that, where an individual dealing in the hire-purchase of musical instruments formed a company to take over his business, and that company agreed to collect the outstandings in respect of past transactions and make them over to him the individual set up a new business as from the transfer of the business to the company. A hire-purchase agreement is not like an ordinary contract of sale, and the several sums of money became due in respect of the old hire-purchase agreements only after the sale of the business to the company. The assessee retained in his own hands after the sale to the company, a right to receive and to have collected for him sums which might or might not become due under the old contracts. This is the distinction between such a case and an out-and-out closing of a business or profession.

Beneficiaries under a will forming a company.—A company was formed for administering property in which a number of beneficiaries under a will were interested. Each beneficiary assigned his interest in the estate to the company receiving shares in exchange. A good part of the estate was under lease to collieries; and this was the principal income of the company. The company claimed that it was only an executor or trustee for the beneficiaries under the will and was not doing 'business' but was in effect a landowner. The Special Commissioners and the High Court accepted this claim; but the Court of Appeal unanimously rejected it.

"The company has become the absolute legal and beneficial owner of the estates and no relation of trustee and cestui que trust exists between it and the beneficiaries. They are relegated to the ordinary position and rights of shareholders . . . and there is no time-limit whatever to the activities of the company," Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Westleigh Estates, 3 A.T.C. 17; 12 Tax Cases 657; (1924) 1 K.B. 390, per Sargant, L.J.

Royalties, annuities or dividends—Receiving and Distributing.—In Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Marine Steam Turbine Co., (1920) 1 K.B. 193; 12 Tax Cases 174, it was held by the High Court that a company doing nothing else than merely receiving royalties which were in effect payments by instalments of the price of the property sold, and distributing dividends to shareholders out of such royalties, was not doing 'business.' In this case the company which had acquired patents sold them to another company in return for cash, some shares and a royalty. Soon thereafter the first company went into voluntary liquidation, but this was stayed and the company went on merely receiving royalties. But for all practical purposes this decision was overruled in Korean Syndicate case, (1921) 3 K.B. 258; 12 Tax Cases 181, in which a company, one of whose purposes inter alia was to acquire and work concessions, acquired a mining concession and without working the mine itself leased it to another company, receiving in return a percentage of profits as royalty; it was held by the Court of Appeal that the first company carried on 'business', viz., turning these concessions to account. The principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in the Korean Syndicate case, (1921) 3 K.B. 258; 12 Tax Cases 181, was approved by the House of Lords in South Bihar Railway Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1925) A.C. 476; 12 Tax Cases 657.

A company was formed in 1895 to acquire and carry on a railway under a contract with the Government of India. In 1906 the company sold the whole undertaking to the Government in return for an annual payment of £30,000 or a payment of a certain sum if and when Government determined the arrangement.

Per L. C. Cave.—"It is true . . . that its principal and only function at the present moment is to receive and distribute the fruits of its undertaking; but that is a part, and a material part, of the purpose for which it came into existence."

Per Lord Sumner.—"To ascertain the business of a limited liability company one must look first at its memorandum and see for what business that provides and whether its objects are still being pursued. The important thing is that the old business still continues of getting some return for capital embarked in the line . . . Business is not confined to being busy; in many businesses long intervals of inactivity occur."

Apart from advancing in its early stages money to Government for construction, the company had always received profits from the Government which worked the lines. The company merely exchanged in 1906 its fluctuating receipts, depending on earnings of the line from year to year, for a fixed annuity. So, the change was not of much consequence.

The above ruling was followed by the Privy Council in the Pondicherry Railway Company's case, 5 I.T.C. 362; 58 I.A. 239; A.I.R. 1931 P.C. 165; 54 Mad. 691. The Court of Session applied the South Bihar ruling in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Edinburgh & Bathgate Railway Co., 12 Tax Cases 895.

Investment by a Shipping Company.—A Shipping Company one of whose objects was "to invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required upon such securities, etc. . . ." had five ships on the date of outbreak of the War. One of these ships was sold, three sunk and one detained by the enemy. The insurance money and the sale proceeds received on account of the ships were invested in fluid resources with a view to resumption of trading or winding up. Held, that the company was carrying on a 'business,' Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Dale Steam Ship Company (Corporation Profits Tax Case), 12 Tax Cases 712.

Company receiving rents.—A company was formed in 1899, its objects being, among other things, to acquire and take over the assets and liabilities of the proprietors of the Theatre Royal, Birmingham. The old proprietors were a joint stock company, who were landowners only and did not work the theatre but had merely received the rents. The new company, on the other hand, acquired the Theatre Royal and other properties subject to an existing lease. Later on, the theatre was rebuilt. During the several years under appeal, the whole of the real estate belonging to the company was let to five tenants under leases, the period of which was in no case less than eighty-nine years. The income of the company consisted of the rents payable under the leases and of interest and dividends on investments. The company contended that it did not carry on a 'trade' or 'business'. Held, that the company was carrying on a trade or business within the principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Korean Syndicate, Ltd., (1921) 3 K.B. 258; 12 Tax Cases 181.

Per Rowlatt, J.—Now the question arises whether the company was carrying on business. Undoubtedly it was, it was enjoying the turning to account of the property which it was formed, among other things, to turn to account, but the form in which its revenue came in was the comfortable form of simply receiving rents.

What I should like to have known, of course, was this: If my way of looking at the facts had not been questioned at all, would it then have been said that it is quite enough to make a company carry on business if it is simply receiving rents which it had arranged for in the course of turning to account the property it has to turn to account? I very much wish that the Court of Appeal in the Korean Syndicate Case, (1921) 3 K.B. 258; 12 Tax Cases 181, could have seen their way to say that if they meant to say it. I do not think Lord Justice Younger meant to say it, nor has anybody said, as far as I can see, that the mere fact that it is a company carrying on something, makes that something a business, when it would not have been a business if a private person had been carrying it on. Nobody has gone the length of saying that, but it is obvious from what the Master of the Rolls said that when you are considering whether a certain form of enterprise is carrying on business or not, it is material to look and see whether it is a company that is doing it. In the present case I think the inclination of my mind on the whole is in favour of the Crown, because it seems to me that looking at what the company were incorporated to do, they applied themselves to that and they were fairly active in the early years in arranging their property, and during those years they enjoyed it and there is nothing more for them to do; but they have not gone out of their business and been left merely with the rents to collect. One can understand that a company might have had a large factory or something of the kind which ceased to manufacture, but here they had property left in their hands and they continued to draw rents and so on. One might say in that case that they were not carrying on business, but as you are to look at the fact that they are a company, and as you are to look at the objects with which they were incorporated, if you find that the only object was to deal with this property, and they are only to deal with that property, although it happens at the moment that all they have to do is to receive the rents for the next 90 years unless they sell the reversion, then I think it is more within the spirit of the decision of the Court of Appeal to say that they are carrying on business even if I think that they were not. The case is very near the line and of some difficulty, but that is the best conclusion to which I can come, therefore I must give judgment for the Crown here, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Birmingham Theatre Royal Estate Company, Ltd., 12 Tax Cases 580.

Speculative building on land, if otherwise it is of the nature of trade will not cease to be such, merely because the trade is carried on largely through a company dominated by the assessee instead of entirely by the assessee. Laver v. Wilkinson, 1944 K.B.D.?

Company—Business of.—There is no limitation on the capacity of a natural person to trade; but a company is bound by its memorandum and articles. It is therefore not only permissible but often necessary to look into them to consider the nature of particular transactions carried on by the company, Commissioners of Taxation v. British Australian Wool Realization Association, 9 A.T.C. 449 (P.C.). Other things being equal, it is therefore more difficult to decide in what circumstances the activities of an individual amount to the carrying on of a trade or business than in what circumstances the activities of a company would similarly amount to the carrying on of a trade or business. In the case of an individual a piece of evidence similar to a company's memorandum or articles is not ordinarily available. Incidentally, a Chartered Company (as distinguished from an Incorporated Company) stands on a peculiar footing, and may do any business that is not specifically prohibited by its charter.

The distinction between a company and an individual in this respect, viz., as to the circumstances in which a particular activity may be a business if conducted by a company whereas if conducted by an individual it might not be a business, was set out in Smith v. Anderson, 15 Ch. D. 247, (a U.K. case under Company Law). But this distinction was hardly emphasized—in fact it had been lost sight of—in various cases under the Income-tax Acts for quite a long time until it came to prominence in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Korean Syndicate, Ltd., (1921) 3 K.B. 258; 12 Tax Cases 181. In that case the Court of Appeal reaffirmed the principles set out in Smith v. Anderson, 15 Ch.D. 247. In the South Bihar Railway case, 12 Tax Cases 657, the House of Lords confirmed the views of the Court of Appeal in the Korean Syndicate case. If an individual had done what the South Bihar Company did, he might not have been held to be carrying on a 'trade' or 'business'. See Lord Sumner's judgment.

On the other hand, the memorandum cannot be conclusive; its value lies in its throwing light on the motive, so to speak, of the company. In other cases, the motive has to be established by other evidence.

It can be argued that a company can do only one business, viz., the business set out in the Memorandum and the Articles. That is, while a company may have different activities, it could have only one business. Whether this argument is valid or not, Revenue decisions (chiefly Excess Profits Duty cases and cases of discontinuance and succession of businesses) proceed on the assumption that, for the purpose of the Taxing Acts, a company may have more than one business.

Difference between Excess Profits Acts and Income-tax Acts.—In Morning Post, Ltd. v. George, K.B.D. (1942 I. T. R. Sup. 20), Lawrence, J., considered that rulings as to what constituted a 'trade' with reference to Excess Profits Duty and Corporation tax should not be automatically extended to cases under the Income-tax Acts because (1) the Excess Profits Duty related to "trades and business" (whether continuously carried on or not); and under the Income-tax Acts, it cannot be assumed that 'trade' and 'business' are always interchangeable, synonymous terms and (2) the Corporation tax related to the "profits of a British company, carrying on any trade or business or any undertaking of a similar character including the holding of investments." In the Morning Post case, the old company, after the amalgamation of the newspapers, received a monthly fixed sum and could not participate in the profits or be responsible for any losses resulting from the joint publication. Such an arrangement did not constitute a 'trade'.

(4-A) "The Central Board of Revenue" means the Central Board of Revenue constituted under the Central Board of Revenue Act, 1924;

This clause was inserted by the Central Board of Revenue Act (IV of 1924).

Formerly the functions of the Central Board of Revenue under this Act were performed by the Board of Inland Revenue.

Its important functions under the Act are as follows:—Section 2 (6)—power to declare a foreign association to be a company; section 2 (11) (b)—power to define 'previous year' in certain cases and to delegate such power; section 5 (4)—determining jurisdiction of appellate Assistant Commissioners; section 5 (5)—permitting the Commissioner and the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner to function in specified cases or classes of cases as the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and Income-tax Officer respectively; section 5 (6)—power to appoint Commissioners, Assistant Commissioners and Income-tax Officers for specified persons, areas or classes of income; section 5 (8)—general control over Income-tax administration; section 18 (6)—power to direct to whom tax deducted at source should be paid; proviso to section 50—condonation of delay in application for certain refunds; section 58-B (5)—appeal against refusal to recognise a provident fund; chapter IX-B, power to recognise and withdraw approval of superannuation funds, and various incidental powers in regard to details of such funds; section 59—power to make rules; section 61—laying down qualifications, etc., for Income-tax practitioners, disposing of appeals against their dismissal, and section 64 (3)—to determine the place of assessment when the Commissioners concerned are not in agreement.

(5) "Commissioner" means a person appointed to be a Commissioner of Income-tax under section 5;

See notes under section 5.

(6) "Company" means a company as defined in the Indian Companies Act, 1913, or formed in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or of Royal Charter or Letters Patent, or of an Act of the Legislature of a British possession, or of a law of an Indian State and includes any foreign association which the Central Board of Revenue, may by general or special order, declare to be a company for the purposes of this Act;

History.—The present definition of company was introduced in the 1918 Act. The definition in the 1886 Act was: "An association carrying on business in British India whose stock or funds is or are divided into shares and transferable whether the company is incorporated or not and whether its principal place of business is situate in India or not."

In 1940, the definition was made to include companies incorporated under laws of Indian States, and the following words "qualifying other foreign association" viz., "carrying on business in British India and whether its principal place of business is situate in British India or not"—were deleted. The former change was made in order to prevent companies in Indian States operating in British India from escaping sub-section (6-A) of section 2, e.g., (by accumulating profits and reducing capital). The object of the deletion of the words qualifying foreign associations is not clear but it would seem that both in respect of Indian States Companies and other foreign associations the result of taxing them as companies i.e., at a flat rate instead of as associations, i.e., at graduated rates will be the lightening of tax in many cases. On the other hand, the Central Board of Revenue is not bound to declare a foreign association to be a company.

The changes in the definition do not affect the ambit of liability to tax which is regulated by section 4 but only the manner of assessment and the quantum of tax.

Companies without shares.—Even companies which have no shares—and are limited by guarantee—are ‘companies’ for the purpose of the Income-tax Act. The general framework of the Act (see sections 16, 18 and 48) however, with its provision for refunds clearly contemplates companies with shares.

Company.—The following is the definition in the Indian Companies Act. “A company formed and registered under this Act or an existing company.”

The rules about incorporation of companies in other parts of the British Empire differ but if a company has been duly incorporated in accordance with the local laws in those parts, it is a ‘company’ for the purposes of the Income-tax Act, no matter what the motives of incorporation were.

Foreign business associations.—See above regarding the change in the definition in 1940. The object of the last part of the section is to include associations, such as the French Societies Anonymes, which have many characteristics in common with the companies recognised by Indian law. But the Central Board of Revenue can make the declaration only if the association is foreign, i.e., not belonging to the British Empire or an Indian State; on the other hand, the Central Board of Revenue is not bound to make such declaration.

Company—How taxed.—A company is assessed to income-tax on its profits at the maximum rate whatever its income. This is done under the Finance Act. The shareholder, however, is entitled to relief under section 48 in respect of the dividends received by him. The dividend is not exempt from tax in the hands of the shareholder but under section 18 (5) he will be given credit for the tax payable (whether paid or not) by the company in respect of the dividend. The assessment of the company’s profits does not depend on the profits distributed. It is based on its profits as computed under sections 8 to 13. The company is not an agent for the purpose of income-tax acting on behalf of the shareholder except to the extent laid down in section 18 (5). No shareholder has a right to have a dividend declared; and it is only after a dividend has been declared that the dividend becomes his income, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blott, 8 Tax Cases 101. The company is assessable as a company on its profits. It is conceivable that the assessable profits may be nil while the company may distribute profits from reserves or some other source. Nevertheless the shareholder can get refund of income-tax under sections 48 and 18 (5).

Super-tax.—Companies pay a flat rate of super-tax on their profits. This again is regulated by the Finance Act. This tax is in no sense paid on behalf of the shareholder; nor is a refund allowed to the shareholder as in the case of income-tax. As already stated the Income-tax Law does not recognise any agency on the part of the company on behalf of the shareholder, except to the extent that it has indirectly countenanced such agency in sections 18 and 48. See Maharajahdiraj of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 1 I.T.C. 303; 3 Patna 470, which arose under section 14, as it stood before 1939, i.e., when dividends as such were exempt from income-tax (but not super-tax) in the hands of the shareholder. A company holding shares in another is liable to pay super-tax again on the dividends received by it. By special exemption under section 60, investment trusts have been relieved from this liability.

Company Super-tax and Corporation Profits Tax.—The super-tax on companies corresponds to the Corporation Profits Tax levied elsewhere but with this difference—the Corporation Profits Tax is or was allowed elsewhere as a deduction from profits for assessment to income-tax whereas the Indian Company super-tax is not. It will be seen that the shareholders in a company are in a worse position than partners in a registered firm. The former have to pay an additional super-tax through the company, though in other respects they are more or less in the same position. Objection has, therefore, been raised to the tax on the ground that it handicaps joint-stock concerns. On the other hand the arguments in favour of the tax are that incorporation as such confers certain advantages which might be legitimately taxed, these advantages being the possibility of limiting liability, corporate finance, freedom of transferring or selling shares, publicity, audit, etc., and the rights of shareholders to enforce liquidation.

Company and partnership.—The principal points of difference between a partnership and a company are the following:—(a) The individual members of a partnership are collectively entitled to the property of the partnership but the property of the company belongs to the company as such and not to the shareholders—Re George Newman & Co., (1895) 1 Ch. 674; (b) The creditors of a firm can proceed against the property of the partners but the creditor of a company can proceed only against the company as such. Flitcroft's case, 21 Ch. D. 533; (c) Unlike a member of a firm, a shareholder cannot dispose of the property of the company or incur liabilities on behalf of the company. A shareholder can contract with his company whereas a partner cannot contract with his firm. All these differences flow out of the fundamental principle that a company is a separate person apart from the shareholders while a firm is not a separate person apart from the partners. The distinction between a firm or partnership and a company has also been put in another way. A partnership is an arrangement between definite individuals bound together by a contract while a company is so to speak a constantly changing partnership or succession of partnerships, Smith v. Anderson, 15 Ch. D. 273.

Company—Separate entity.—Upon the issue of the certificate of incorporation a company becomes a body corporate—see section 24 of the Indian Companies Act. As already stated it is not like a partnership or association (leaving aside the Hindu undivided family which is peculiar), a mere collection or aggregation of individuals but a separate legal person entirely distinct from the shareholders—a metaphysical entity (as has been described by Palmer), a fiction of law with no physical existence.

'One-man' Companies—Not invalid.—The law does not prescribe any minimum shares to be held by a shareholder nor a maximum. An 'one-man' company therefore is not forbidden by law.

"The statute enacts nothing as to the extent or degree of interest which may be held by each of the seven, or as to the proportion of interest, or influence, possessed by one or the majority of the shareholders over the others," per L. C. Halsbury in Salomon v. Salomon.

& Co., (1897) A.C. 22. "It was said in the present case that six shareholders other than the appellant were mere dummies, his nominees, and held shares in trust for him. I will assume this was so. In my opinion it makes no difference," per Lord Herschell, ibid. "There is nothing in the Act requiring that the subscribers to the memorandum should be independent or unconnected, or that they or any of them should take a substantial interest in the undertaking or that they should have a mind and will of their own as one of the learned judges seemed to think or that there should be anything like a balance of power in the constitution of a company," per Lord Macnaghten, ibid.

The facts of the above case are as below: Salomon, a leather merchant and the owner of a profitable business, converted his business into a private company. He was solvent at the time. Of the shares he took 20,000 and his wife and children a share each. Salomon also received debentures to the amount of £10,000 in part payment by the company for the business. Later on, the company went into liquidation and the validity of these debentures was challenged on the ground that the company was a sham. The Court of first instance held that Salomon was bound to pay the unsecured creditors of the company out of his own pocket even though his shares had been fully paid up. This decision was confirmed by the Court of Appeal but on a slightly different ground, viz., the whole scheme was a fraud on the law which required substantial shareholders and not mere dummies. This decision was unanimously reversed by the House of Lords who held that there was nothing in the law which required the seven shareholders to be beneficially or substantially interested.

The ordinary reason for which a man forms his business into a company is that he may have the advantage of the trading of the company, by holding a greater part of the shares and receiving a greater part of the profits in dividends as they are distributed; while at the same time he need not be personally liable on the contracts which are made to earn the profits. That this is a perfectly legitimate object was decided by the House of Lords in the case of Salomon v. Salomon, (1897) A.C. 22, quoted above.

Incorporation cannot be challenged.—If a certificate of incorporation had been obtained wrongly, that may be a ground for the persons interested to get the certificate cancelled; but so long as the certificate is in force it is valid as against the world. The income-tax authorities cannot refuse to recognise as a 'company' a company that has actually been registered under the Indian Companies Act; seeing that the definition of 'company' in the Indian Income-tax Act begins 'company means a company as defined in the Indian Companies Act, 1913'.

Company—Doing business of other persons.—"There may be a position such as that although there is a legal entity within the case of Salomon v. Salomon, (1897) A.C. 22, that legal entity may be acting as the agent for another person or it is conceivable that although there be a legal entity that legal entity may really be doing the business of somebody else and not its own business at all," per M. R. Sterndale in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sansom, 8 Tax Cases 22.

A company being a separate legal entity, the mere fact that only one individual is beneficially interested in all the shares and that the company in effect acts as his agent or nominee will not in itself make its income the income of the shareholder. A company was formed to take over another company and refloat the latter, the sole beneficial shareholder being precluded from using his own name as promoter. It was held that the income of the company was not the income of the shareholder. O. K. Trust, Ltd. v. Rees, 19 A.T.C. 185 (K.B.).

See also Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., 4 Tax Cases 41; St. Louis Breweries v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cases 111; United States Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cases 17; Gramophone and Typewriter Co., Ltd. v. Stanley, 5 Tax Cases 358; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. John Sansom, 8 Tax Cases 20. The Income-tax Officer can examine the genuineness of one-man companies and tax shareholders on the basis of the true nature of transactions, e.g., when dividends are disguised as loans, the Income-tax Officer can tax the shareholder—see In re Sir D. M. Petit, 2 I.T.C. 255, but, in the absence of a specific finding of fact that a company is doing the business of some one else, (e.g., an individual who controls it) the court will not assume that it is doing so, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Morgan-Grenville-Gavin, 20 Tax Cases 529; (1936) 1 A.E.R. 895 (K.B.D.).

(6-A) 'Dividend' includes—

(a) any distribution by a company of accumulated profits, whether capitalised or not, if such distribution entails the release by the company to its shareholders of all or any part of the assets of the company;

(b) any distribution by a company of debentures or debenture-stock, to the extent to which the company possesses accumulated profits, whether capitalised or not;

(c) any distribution made to the shareholders of a company out of accumulated profits of the company on the liquidation of the company:

Provided that only the accumulated profits so distributed which arose during the six previous years of the company preceding the date of liquidation shall be so included; and

(d) any distribution by a company on the reduction of its capital to the extent to which the company possesses accumulated profits which arose after the end of the previous year ending next before the 1st day of April, 1933, whether such accumulated profits have been capitalised or not:

Provided that 'dividend' does not include a distribution in respect of any share issued for full cash consideration which is not entitled in the event of liquidation to participate in the surplus assets, when such distribution is made in accordance with sub-clause (c) or (d).

Explanation.—The words 'accumulated profits' wherever they occur in this clause, shall not include 'capital profit'.

History.—This definition was inserted in 1939. Its intention is brought out in the following extract from the report of the Select Committee:

"We have recast and expanded the definition of 'dividend', primarily in order to ensure that no distribution falling under this head shall be taxed unless there is a release of assets. Under the amended definition a debenture will when issued be treated as a dividend but an ordinary bonus share will not be liable to taxation until it is actually paid off. The definition further secures that accumulated profits distributed on the liquidation of the company shall only be included in dividend for the purposes of taxation, if they arose within six years of the liquidation. Clause (d) of the revised definition provides for the case in which a company tries to disguise a distribution of profits as a reduction of capital."

Includes.—The definition expands the ordinary meaning of the word 'dividend', and should be read along with the special definition of 'income' in section 2 (6-C.) As a result, certain types of dividends which would otherwise, under various rulings, both English and Indian, be considered to be of a capital nature are deemed to be income.

"The word 'dividend' carries no spell with it. Applicable to various subjects, it is not intelligible without knowing the matter to which it is meant as referring, but its ordinary meaning is share of profits". Henry v. G. N. Railway, 27 L.J.Ch. 1.

In fact in ordinary usage the meaning is even more restricted and applies to a share of profits in companies and in any case, the definition in this clause refers to payments by companies only.

'Company'.—See the definition of this word in section 2 (6). The special definition of 'dividend' in clause (6-A) applies to the dividends of all companies, including those that may be dealt with under sections 23-A, and 44-D et seq.

Income already taxed in the hands of a person under sections 23-A or section 44-D et seq cannot again be taxed in the ordinary course in his hands at a later stage as a dividend, see sections 23-A (4) 44-D (9). Cf. also Inland Revenue v. Roberts, 9 Tax Cases 603 (C.A.).

Part (a) of definition.—Two conditions have to be satisfied, viz., (a) the distribution must be from accumulated profits, not from capital sources or appreciation thereof, see the Explanation (under the definition) which is really otiose and has been inserted out of abundant caution, and (b) there should be a release by the company to the shareholders, of its assets. A loan to a shareholder will, evidently not be a distribution of profits; nor will a dividend paid out of capital sources, e.g., sale of fixed assets or appreciation of capital.

As regards condition (b), see Blott's case, (1921) A.C. 171; 8 Tax Cases 101 and Pool's case, (1922) 1 K.B. 347; 8 Tax Cases 167, both of which are referred to below. The judgment of Sankey, J., in the latter brings out clearly what is meant by a release of assets. An ordinary bonus share as such clearly does not release any assets, but if at any time a share is paid off, whether in cash or in kind, e.g., a redeemable preference share, there will then be a release of assets.

The distribution need not take the form of a dividend. A loan not intended to be repaid (Jacobs v. Inland Revenue, 10 Tax Cases 1), a distribution through a Reserve Fund (Inland Revenue v. Doneaster) or in any manner without an increase in the share or loan capital are all within the mischief of this definition. On the other hand, a distribution, even as a dividend, if conditional on an equivalent, simultaneous loan from the shareholder to the company, may not amount to a distribution of income at all. Inland Revenue v. Marbob, Ltd., 18 A.T.C. 257 (K.B.).

The words 'whether capitalised or not', occurring also in parts (b) and (d), are intended to make it clear that the decision of the company to capitalise profits, whether as bonus shares or as bonus debentures or in any other form, though valid and conclusive as against the rest of the world, will not save the distribution from the mischief of this definition if otherwise the conditions laid down in this definition are satisfied.

See Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Ramaswamy Chettiar, 1941 I.T.R. 656, in which a refund of tax was unsuccessfully claimed on the ground that a bonus share represented a dividend.

Shareholder.—Includes all shareholders, holding preference, ordinary or deferred shares. There is no definition of a shareholder in the Indian Companies Act, but the definition of a 'share' is as below:—

Section 2 (16).—"Share means share in the share capital of the company, and includes stock except when a distinction between stock and shares is expressed or implied."

Part (b).—This part mostly nullifies the decision of the Privy Council in Mercantile Bank of India (Trustees of Yule) v. Commissioners of Income-tax, Bengal, 1936 I.T.R. 239, which followed the decision of the House of Lords in Blott's and Fisher's cases, reported respectively in (1921) A.C. 171 and (1926) A.C. 395.

Unlike part (a) of the definition, this part does not refer to any release of assets. According to this definition a debenture as such is deemed to constitute a release of assets even though it may be redeemable only after a long time or not at all.

As to the meaning of the word 'stock'; see per Lord Hatherley in Horrice v. Ayloner, (1875) 7 H.L. 717.

"The difference between stock and shares is that shares are not necessarily paid up whereas stock can exist only in the paid up state, and that shares cannot be bought or sold in fractions whereas the consolidated stock of a company can be split up into as many portions as one likes and bought or sold in such fractions. Otherwise stock is just like shares; it is in fact simply a set of shares put together in a bundle."

and the above remarks apply, mutatis mutandis to debenture stock.

It should be noted that the debentures referred to in this definition can be taxed as income only to the extent that they are covered by accumulated profits in the hands of the company, i.e., not when issued out of capital sources.

Part (c).—This part of the definition nullifies, for this purpose, the decision in Burrell's case, 9 Tax Cases 27; (1924) 2 K.B. 52 (C.A.), which has been followed in India also. In the absence of this definition, the distribution of assets by a liquidator would be all capital irrespective of their origin.

Under this part of the definition, the distribution can be treated as income only to the extent it is covered by accumulated profits, i.e., not when met out of capital sources; and the proviso further excludes profits accumulated earlier than during the six previous years before liquidation. Payments out of profits made during liquidation will presumably be capital in the hands of the shareholder.

The 'date of liquidation' is evidently the date of commencement of liquidation.

Part (d).—The object of this part is to prevent the distribution of profits in the guise of reduction of capital so as to escape tax. It will be noted that, while under part (c) accumulated profits for only six previous years are taken into account, this part takes into account all profits arising after the previous year preceding 1st April, 1933.

Second proviso.—The object of this proviso which applies to parts (c) and (d) both is to save from the operation of these parts preference shares which have no right to undistributed profits and can only claim their own capital value on liquidation. If a preference share with no share in surplus assets is paid off in liquidation even out of past accumulated profits, the distribution is not a dividend. The words 'issued for full cash consideration' were inserted in order to confine the protection to bona fide preference shares. The consideration must both be 'full' and in 'cash', and the latter condition will exclude from the benefit preference shares issued in return for full value but not for cash. And, clearly, it will exclude from the benefit shares issued in return for the abandonment of claim to arrears of dividends.

It will be seen that even if the shares have only a limited right to participate in surplus profits on liquidation, they cannot get the benefit of the proviso.

Dividends out of exempt income.—All that this definition does is to treat as income what would otherwise be considered to be capital, and the taxability, in the hands of the shareholder of dividends paid by a company from sources of income not liable to tax, e.g., from agricultural income or from tax-free securities or, in certain circumstances, from income abroad would not be affected one way or the other by this definition. See notes under section 16 (2).

Refunds.—If dividends which would not otherwise be taxable are taxed under this definition, it stands to reason that they will be eligible for refunds under section 48 and section 49 et seq., credit being given under section 18.

Bonus Shares.—The following rulings, mostly relating to the United Kingdom deserve study even though the definition in this clause renders some of them nugatory as already explained in the notes under each part. There is no provision in the United Kingdom statutes corresponding to this definition, and the rulings were given with reference to general considerations as to income and capital which have to be borne in mind when there are no clear statutory provisions.

In Bouch v. Sproule, 12 A.C. 385, a testator bequeathed his residuary estate in trust for his wife for life and after her death to some one else absolutely. Part of the residue constituted shares in a company whose directors had power before recommending a dividend to set apart out of the profits such sum as they thought proper as reserve fund for certain purposes. On the recommendation of the directors the company by special resolution passed a new article empowering the directors, with the sanction of the company in a general meeting afterwards given, to declare a bonus to be paid to the shareholders out of the reserve fund with its profits so enlarged or out of any other accumulated profits in proportion to their shares. The directors allotted to each shareholder new shares in proportion to his existing holdings, crediting the amount taken from the reserve fund as paid upon the new shares. It was held that the allocation by the company was in substance not a distribution of profits but a capitalisation thereof.

Per Lord Justice Fry, in the Court of Appeal—

“When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stocks in a company which has the power either of distributing its profits as dividend or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life, and what is paid by the company to the shareholder as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock in the concern, enures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital.”

cited with approval by Lords Herschell and Watson in the House of Lords who confirmed the decision.

In re Taylor: Waters v. Taylor, (1926) Ch. 923, following Bouch v. Sproule, (1887) 12 A.C. 385 and In re Evans, (1913) 1 Ch. 23, it was held that in deciding questions of capital and income as between remaindermen and life tenants the intention of the company should be regarded. Did it intend to capitalize? Reference should be had to substance and not to form. The fact that in form an option is given to the shareholder does not necessarily decide that the bonus shares are income and not capital.

Similarly in In re Bates: Mountain v. Bates, (1928) Ch. 683, in which a company sold assets at favourable prices and carried the difference between this and the book value to suspense and gave cash bonuses to shareholders with a covering letter that the bonuses were capital payments not liable to income-tax or super-tax, it was held as between remainderman and life tenant that no bonus shares having been issued the payments were income and not capital. On the other hand, in In re Ward's Will Trusts: Ringland v. Ward, 15 A.T.C. 502, it was held that, where a company distributed its surplus funds from sale of capital assets as capital in cash to its members proportionately according to their shares these receipts were capital as between life tenants and remaindermen.

Though Bouch v. Sproule was not a Revenue decision but one relating to the rights of a tenant for life and the remainderman, the general principle underlying it, viz., that if a company validly capitalises its profits, its action is valid as against the outside world was considered in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blott, 8 Tax Cases 101, infra to extend to Revenue matters also.

In Swan Brewery Company v. The King, (1914) A.C. 231, however, it was held under an Act of West Australia which specially defined “dividend” as including “every dividend, profit, advantage or gain intended to be paid or credited to or distributed among any members or directors of any company except the salary or other ordinary remuneration of directors” that bonus shares issued out of undivided profits were taxable as income; that is to say, the company had in effect declared a dividend within the meaning of the Act equal to the nominal amount of the new shares. A very similar case was Nicholas v. Commissioner of Taxes, Victoria, 1941 I.T.R. (Sup.) 53 (P.C.).

But this decision was not followed by the House of Lords in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blott, though Lord Sumner who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council in the Swan Brewery case and also sat in the House of Lords in the Blott case considered that the decision of the Privy Council did not turn on the special definition of "dividend" in the taxing statute of West Australia.

Bonus Shares—In same company—Not income.—An assessee was a shareholder in a Limited Company, which, under the authority of its Articles of Association, had declared a bonus out of its undivided profits and, in satisfaction of such bonus, had allotted to its shareholders as fully paid up certain ordinary shares forming part of the company's authorised but unissued capital. The shareholders had no option to receive cash in lieu of shares in satisfaction of the bonus. Held (Lords Dunedin and Sumner dissenting), that the shares credited to the respondent in respect of the bonus, being distributed by the company as capital, were not income in the hands of the assessee, (1921) 2 A.C. 171 (H.L.).

"A shareholder is not entitled to claim that the company should apply its undivided profits in payment to him of dividend. Whether it must do so or not is a matter of internal management to be decided by the majority of the shareholders. He cannot sue for such a dividend until he has been given a special title by its declaration. Until then, no doubt, the profits are profits in the hands of the company until it has properly disposed of them, and it is assessable for income-tax in respect of these profits. But if, acting within its powers, it disposes of these profits by converting them into capital instead of paying them over to the shareholders, that, as I conceive it, is conclusive as against all the outside world, including the Crown, and the form of the benefit which the shareholder receives from the money in the hands of the company is one which is for determination by the company alone."

" The money so applied is capital and never becomes profit in the hands of the shareholder at all. What the latter gets is no doubt a valuable thing. But it is a thing in the nature of an extra share certificate in the company. His new shares do not give him an immediate right to a larger amount of the existing assets. These remain where they were. The new shares simply confer a title to a larger proportion of the surplus assets if and when a general distribution takes place, as in a winding up. . . . Per Lord Haldane, at p. 182, 184.

" As the capital was increased, it might reasonably be expected that the profits of the company would be increased, and that the shareholders would benefit in this way, but their relative shares in the undertaking remained the same. The use of the sums which had been available for dividend to increase capital would enable the company to carry on a larger and more profitable business, which might be expected to yield larger dividends. These dividends, however, were to be in the future. So far as the present was concerned there was no dividend out of the accumulated profits; these were devoted to increasing the capital of the company. The company had power to do what it pleased with any profits which it might make. It might spend the accumulated profits in the improvement of the company's works and buildings and machinery. These improvements might lead to a great accession of business and increase of profits by which every shareholder would benefit, but of course it could not for a moment be contended that such a benefit would render him liable to super-tax in respect of it. The benefit would not be in the nature of income, and super-tax can be levied only on income. It would be so levied on the dividends afterwards received" per Lord Finlay, at p. 193.

"The benefit, and the sole benefit which the assessee derived, was that the business in which he had a share was a larger one, with more capital embarked in it, precisely as might have been the case if the accumulated profits had been applied in the improvement of the company's works and machinery. . . . The preference shares are in themselves valueless".—Per Lord Finlay, at p. 195.

"The transaction took nothing out of the company's coffers, and put nothing into the shareholders' pockets; and the only result was that the company, which before the resolution could have distributed the profit by way of dividend, or carried it temporarily to reserve, came thenceforth under an obligation to retain it permanently as capital. It is true that the shareholder could sell his bonus shares, but in that case he would be realising a capital asset producing income, and the proceeds would not be income in his hands. It appears to me that, if the substance and not the form of the transaction is looked to, the declaration of a bonus was, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt said, "bare machinery" for capitalising profits, and there was no distribution of profits to the shareholders".—Per Lord Cave at p. 200.

" . . . It takes two to make a paid-up share. A share issued . . . is a share to be paid for; paid for by the allottee in meal or in malt; in money, unless by contract between himself and the company he is enabled to satisfy his obligation to pay by some other consideration moving from himself to the company. Under the contract in question, what consideration so moves from the shareholders? None that I can see, except the discharge of the company's debt for a dividend, which has become due to him by being declared. When debt for dividend is set off against debt for calls and the account is squared, the equivalent of payment of a dividend takes place. If the word 'bonds' has some effect to the contrary, then no consideration has moved from the shareholder and his shares are not fully paid. The company can choose whether it will divide its profits in meal or in malt; if it decides to divide otherwise than in cash, a contract to accept something in lieu of cash operates nothing, for no right to cash has accrued. A contract to accept shares in satisfaction instead of cash implies, first a declaration which gives the right that has to be satisfied, and second a satisfaction of that right, which is equivalent to payment. . . . It is just as reasonable to call the shares allotted 'mere machinery' for wrapping up a distribution of profits as to call bonus shares 'mere machinery' for effecting distribution of capital" Per Lord Sumner dissenting in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blott, 8 Tax Cases 101; (1921) 2 A.C. 171 at p. 212.

A company distributed its dividends in the shape of fully paid-up shares in the concern, the shareholders having no option to take the profits in any other form. Held, following Commissioner of Inland Revenue v. Blott, 8 Tax Cases 101, and distinguishing Swan Brewery v. The King, (1919) A.C. 231 that there was no "income, profits or gains" to the shareholders which was taxable to super-tax. The Court emphasised the word "advantage" which occurred in the Colonial Act in the Swan Brewery Case. Steel Bros. & Coy. v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 326. The Crown appealed to the Privy Council for leave under the prerogative powers but the Privy Council refused to give leave. A similar decision was given by the Madras High Court in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Binny & Coy., 1 I.T.C. 358; 47 Mad. 837 in which Binny & Company as shareholders in the Deccan Sugar and Abkari Company received a share of the accumulated undistributed profits of the latter concern in the shape of bonus shares.

Bonus Shares—Of other Company.—A company which was registered and carried on business in England as an Investment Trust Company owned a number of common shares of $100 each in the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, an American Company, had so invested its accumulated reserve funds as to contravene the Sherman Anti-Trust Statute. The company was required by the Court to dispose of its entire holding of Common Stock of the Southern Pacific Railway Company in such a manner as to terminate the control of that company by the Union Pacific Railroad Company. An arrangement for this purpose received the approval of the Court, and was carried into effect, under which a portion of the said holding of Southern Pacific Railway Company's Common Stock was transferred to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in exchange for holdings of Preferred Stock and Common Stock in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and the remainder of the holding was sold for cash. The Union Pacific Railroad Company thereupon distributed a substantial portion of its accumulated surplus funds, and declared an extra dividend on its common stock, to be satisfied by the distribution to the holder of each $100 share of $12 (par value) Preference Stock and $22.50 (par value) Common Stock in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and $3.00 in cash. At the same time the company announced its intention to reduce the regular rate of dividends on its Common Stock from 10 per cent., at which for many years it had stood to 8 per cent., but explained that the annual income derivable from the Stock, etc., comprising the Extra Dividend would compensate approximately for the reduction of 2 per cent., in the rate of dividend.

The assessee company duly received certain Common Stock and Preference Stock in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, together with a payment in cash in respect of the Extra Dividend on its holding of common stock in the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and it sold the stocks included in such Extra Dividend for £1,086-19-6 and credited the proceeds to capital account in its books.

Held, that in the payment of the Extra Dividend there was a distribution not of capital assets but of assets which were profits or gains in respect of which the assessee company was chargeable with income-tax, Pool v. Guardian Investment, etc., 8 Tax Cases 167; (1922) 1 K.B. 347.

Per Sankey, J.—There have been many decisions chiefly in connection with the winding up of the companies, or the interpretation of wills, where the difference between income, capital and accumulated profits has been discussed and dealt with, and there are undoubtedly some where it has been held that, by reason of the facts, accumulated profits have been transmuted into capital. For example In re Bridgewater Navigation Company, (1891) 2 Ch. 317; In re Spanish Prospecting Company, Limited, (1911) 1 Ch. 92; and In re Thomas, (1916) 2 Ch. 331, it was held that accumulated profits had not been impressed with the character of, or become, capital. In Bouch v. Sproule, (1887) 12 A.C. 385, it was held they had” at p. 353.

“As Lord Finlay, says in Blott's case, 8 Tax Cases 101: “The case differs toto caelo from a case in which a dividend is paid not in money but in money's worth by the delivery, say, of goods or securities.” If there has been no release of assets, there has been no distribution and there is nothing to tax; neither is there anything to tax if the release is the distribution of capital. The Blott's case was so decided because the majority of the Members of the House of Lords were of opinion that there had been no release of assets. The company in fact kept the assets in respect of, and distributed, previously unissued capital. Similarly in Bouch v. Sproule, (1887) 12 A.C. 385, the company kept the accumulated profits and allotted new shares (partly paid up) in respect thereof.” at p. 355.

“In my view the true test as to whether a distribution of shares falls to be taxed depends upon two questions:—(1) whether there has been a release of assets, and (2) if so, whether the assets released were capital or income” at p. 357.

As to (1).—In the present case there has been a release of assets within the meaning of the words as used by the majority of the Law Lords in Blott's case. As to (2).—I doubt if it is possible, I am sure it is not desirable, to lay down in answer to the second question any general rule for future guidance.” at p. 357.

“The matter appears to be free from authority in England, but it has already been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States where the principles of law to be applied in this respect do not differ, in my view, from our own. In the case of Peabody v. Eisner, (1918) 247 U. S. Reports 347, it was held that a dividend by a Corporation of shares owned by it in another Corporation is not a stock dividend and is subject to the tax like an equivalent distribution of money. By a ‘stock dividend’ is meant a dividend paid in the company’s own stock which, as the Court pointed out, in fact took nothing from the property of the Corporation and added nothing to the interest of the shareholder, but merely changed the evidence which represented this interest.

Later on the whole matter was discussed and it was decided in Eisner v. Macomber, (1920) 252 U. S. Reports 189, that mere growth or increment of value in a capital investment is not income: income is essentially a gain or profit in itself of exchangeable value, proceeding from capital, severed from it and received by the taxpayer for his separate use, benefit and disposal, and that a stock dividend evidencing merely a transfer of an accumulated surplus to the capital account of the Corporation takes nothing from the property of the Corporation and adds nothing to that of the shareholders and a tax on such dividend is a tax on capital increase” at p. 358.

“As Mr. Justice Pitney points out in giving the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, at page 206 of the Report, the fundamental relation of capital to income has been much discussed by economists, the former being likened to the tree or the land, the latter to the fruit or the crop—the former depicted as a reservoir supplied from springs, the latter as the outlet stream to be measured by its flow during a period of time. He cites on the subsequent page various definitions, one of which was that income may be defined as the gain derived from capital, from labour or from both combined, and points out that the essential matter is that income is not a gain accruing to capital but a gain derived from capital.

"Applying the metaphor of a reservoir to Blott's Case, 8 Tax Cases 101 the facts found therein may be stated as follows:—From the reservoir of capital certain proceeds were allowed to flow down the outlet stream, but these proceeds were not allowed to reach the shareholder; the company enlarged the area of the reservoir and put back the proceeds into the enlarged reservoir—in other words the proceeds in that case never became the profits or gain or income of the shareholder but were put back into the capital of the company and the unissued shares issued to the shareholder in respect thereof.

In the present case just the opposite has happened. The proceeds have been allowed to flow down the outlet stream, but they have not been put back into capital. They have been allowed to reach the shareholder in the form of a cash payment and a dividend in specie of the shares of another company, or, as Lord Halsbury put it in Tennant v. Smith, 3 Tax Cases 158; (1892) A.C. 150, 156. "There has been a distribution of money and of money's worth." I am far from saying that there can never be a distribution of capital to the shareholders of the company. There might certainly be such a distribution in the case of the voluntary winding up of a company and the division of its capital assets among the shareholders, but in the present case, I am entirely unable to say that there was any distribution of capital, as distinguished from profits or gains. I again repeat the words of Lord Finlay in Blott's Case, 8 Tax Cases 101, where he said that that case differed toto caelo from a case in which a dividend is paid not in money, but in money's worth by the delivery, say, of goods or of securities. As Mr. Justice Pitney in Macomber's case 252, U.S. at page 215:—The reliance upon the supposed analogy between a dividend of the Corporation's own shares and one made by the distribution of shares owned by it in the stock of another company calls for no comment beyond the statement that the latter distributes assets of the company among the shareholders while the former does not.

In the present case there has been, as above stated, a distribution of assets and for the reasons that I have endeavoured to give, in my view those assets were not capital assets, but were profits or gains and are taxable under the Income-tax Act.

The so-called dividend was severed from the capital, was not added to it and never became part of it, but was received by the company for its separate use, benefit and disposal." A. F. Pool v. Guardian Investment Trust Company, Limited, 8 Tax Cases 167; (1922) 1 K.B. 347; 359. This decision was quoted with approval by the House of Lords in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Executors of Bishop Fisher, 10 Tax Cases 302; (1926) A.C. 395.

Following Pool's case it was held in Howard Wilkinson v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 52, that so long as what is distributed to shareholders is the investments of the company in another company it is immaterial whether the distribution is made as capital or as extra dividend; in either case the distribution is taxable in the hands of the shareholder as income. The Court left open the question what would be the position if the accumulated profits of the company had disappeared and the investments were required to answer the share capital in the balance sheet.

Profit and Loss, and bonus shares issued out of the latter to be satisfied by shares of the subsidiary which were allotted by the latter directly to the shareholders of the parent company, the first shareholders of the subsidiary being identical with those of the parent company. It was claimed by a shareholder that the assets of the subsidiary were meant to remain as capital to help the parent company in its work and that the value of the bonus shares was not taxable being of the nature of capital. It was held (by Rowlatt, J.) that it was taxable. The assets had passed from the possession of the parent company; and there had been no increase either in its share capital or in its loan capital. Further a distribution to shareholders if paid out of profits is a dividend unless validly capitalised, i.e., by the distributing company, and there can be no question of one company capitalising a distribution made by another company. The assets having been released by the parent company, the value of the shares in the new company was taxable, Briggs v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 17 Tax Cases 11 following Hill and others v. Permanent Trustee Company of New South Wales and others, (1930) A.C. 720 and In re Piercy: Whitwham v. Piercy, (1907) 1 Ch. 289.

In a case involving rights of remaindermen and life interest holders (not an income-tax case) trust funds were invested in certain cumulative preference shares, dividends on which got into arrears. Under a scheme of re-construction, the preference shareholders waived their right to arrears and received in return certain ordinary shares surrendered by the ordinary shareholders. Held, that the ordinary shares so received were income and not capital in the hands of the recipients, the company not having capitalised the moneys, In re McIver's Settlement: McIver v. Rae, 14 A.T.C. 571; (1936) Ch. 198. In another case in which dividends on cumulative preference shares fell into arrears and, with the sanction of the Court, the ordinary shares were subdivided into smaller ones and part of these subdivided shares was paid to the preference shareholders in cancellation of their arrear dividends it was held, following McIver's case, that the value of the ordinary shares received by the preference shareholders was income. In re Smith's Will Trust: Smith v. Melville, 15 A.T.C. 613 (Ch.D.). While a company has the right to capitalise its profits, it cannot convert income into capital by mere accounting devices. A company A lent money to another company B. The latter got into difficulties, and such interest as it paid was used by A to write down the loan in its books since it thought that the debt was bad. B, however, eventually prospered and paid off the loan and interest in full. A credited the excess of the receipt over the written-down book value of the loan as a capital receipt and distributed it to its shareholders as a capital surplus. Held, that the shareholders were taxable on this distribution, the money being, in truth, income representing interest which had been used in the first instance in writing down the debt, Dixon v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 A.T.C. 36 (K.B.D.).

Bonus Debentures—Same company.—A company distributed its undivided profits in the shape of debentures—a portion of which were to be exchanged for fully paid preference shares. Held, by the House of Lords affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Rowlatt, J.), that these debentures were not income in the hands of the shareholders, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Fisher's Executors, (1926) A.C. 395; 10 Tax Cases 302.

The judgment of Lord Sumner (who was in the minority in Blott's Case) sets out the ratio decidendi very clearly, (1926) A.C. at p. 507.

"Shortly stated, I understand that Blott's case was decided on this principle. To attract super-tax to a bonus distributed to him by a company, in which he is a shareholder, what reaches the tax-payer must at that moment bear the character of income, impressed upon it by the Company which distributes it, and by it alone. Provided that the Company violates no statute and also keeps within its articles, it can call the subject-matter of the distribution what it likes, and I think, this involves the corollary, that it can either call it by a new name or simply discard its old one. After all, it is natural for the creature to be named by its creator. Further what the company says it is, that it is as against all the world. What the company says it shall no longer be, that it is no longer for any purpose. How this is effected and by what resolutions, confirmations and instruments does not matter, for such things are "bare machinery". In what the company has said and done is found the answer to the question. What has the subject-matter of the distribution now become or ceased to be, when first it reaches the tax-payer? See Viscount Haldane, 182, 184, 188 and Viscount Finlay, pp. 194, 196, 197 of (1921) 2 A.C. Transmuted by this alchemy, profits in hard-earned gold became extra share-certificates, and yet the shareholders, who receive them, may be greatly the gainers.

Both cases are alike in the following respects. In both, the company had among its assets considerable amounts of undivided profits and its board proposed to distribute among its shareholders shares of stocks of an aggregate face value corresponding to the amount of the undivided profits, which were to be dealt with. The company passed a resolution to distribute a bonus in the form in the one case of preference shares, part of an authorised but as yet unissued amount, and in the other of debenture-stock, newly created for the purpose. In the former case the shares were to be credited as fully paid and, as between the company and the shareholders, the shares distributed carried no liability for calls but enjoyed a full right to participation upon the footing that they were paid up. In truth, however, nothing was paid up on the shares, though alterations in the books and balance-sheet were made as required. In the latter case the company executed a trust deed in which a large indebtedness was acknowledged to exist, which in truth was purely voluntary, for the company had borrowed nothing and owned nothing to the trustees, and the deed included a covenant to pay off that indebtedness at a future time. . . . In neither case were any assets "released", Pool's case, (1922) 1 K.B. 357; 8 Tax Cases 167; they remained in the business just as before. In each case the advantage, which the company got by what was done, was simply this, that money, which might have been distributed at any time as dividend under ordinary resolutions declaring a dividend and authorising its payment, could no longer be dispersed in this simple way, but, if at all, only by more complicated resolutions duly passed by the shareholders and in Blott's Case probably involving liquidation. Were there an antagonism in interest between a company and its shareholders, there might be some intrinsic advantage in such a change, but otherwise the object of it must in Blott's Case be sought in some conflict of view between different bodies of shareholders as to the extent of the conservation of assets to be adopted by the company and in the present case also in some private liability affecting some of the shareholders but not the company. As a matter of fact, if the sum, in respect of which the debenture stock was issued in this case, had been distributed as cash dividends, nearly the whole of the ordinary shareholders would have been chargeable with super-tax in the following year, and some of them in large amounts. To the company this mattered nothing, but I cannot think it was lost sight of in the transactions in question.

In both cases the resolution with which the transaction began spoke of "capitalising" the undivided profits and distributing the sum dealt with as a "bonus," and in both cases the use of the word "dividend" was carefully avoided. It was submitted to your Lordships, as the essence of the decision in Blott's Case, that assets, consisting of profits earned but not divided, were to be turned into authorised share capital, and that, if so, the decision would not apply in the present case, where no alteration was made in the share capital. I am unable to accept the first reply suggested by the respondents, that the sum actually was turned into capital, namely, loan capital, since it is clear that no such addition to effective capital, as arises when a company borrows a large sum on the security of its assets, was brought into existence at all, and I do not myself think that debts or promises to pay form part of capital, though some debtors do. The second reply was very different, namely, that it was natural to speak of "capitalising" and "converting" into capital in Blott's Case for there a purported "capitalisation" took place, but these expressions ought not to be read as limiting the ratio decidendi to cases, where new paid-up capital is created in the strict sense of the word. The real application of the principle is to assets, from which any further character of divisible profits has been taken away, whatever may be the substituted character thereafter impressed upon them. If so, that principle applies here. My Lords, for my part I think this argument is right and to hold otherwise would be disloyal to the former decision of your Lordship's House.

There are also expressions in Bouch v. Sproule and in Blott's Case which direct attention to the "substance" of the company's transaction, but I do not think these affect the present appeal either. Lord Herschell, 12 A.C. 398, speaks of looking at "both the substance and the form"; so does Lord Finlay in Blott's Case, (1921) 2 A.C. 198. Lord Cave, on the other hand, uses the expression, (1921) 2 A.C. 201: "If the substance and not the form of the transaction is looked to." In both cases, however, both the form and substance were fully considered. Not only were the deeds and resolutions construed, but the scheme of the transaction, its financial results, and the supposed desires and intentions of the company were examined. Lord Finlay speaks of the option, which was given to the shareholder in Bouch v. Sproule, as one which should be ignored because it was merely formal, (1921) A.C. 198. Lord Cave speaks of that option as at least so substantial that it might make a difference, and a feature not occurring in Blott's Case (p. 202). In spite, however, of these discussions and divergences all the noble and learned Lords, who formed the majority, refused to be influenced by the fact that to call the shares "paid up" was formally untrue, on the ground that the form of transferring the required sum from the category of undivided profits to that of paid-up share capital had been correctly gone through in accordance with the articles.

. . . I think it is unusual, where the form of a transaction is against those whose transaction it is to invoke the substance in their favour, in order to eke out what they have left defective in form. Sometimes, again, it is the "intention" of the company that is said to be dominant, Burrell's Case, (1924) 2 K.B. 52; sometimes it is what the company "desired" to do, Blott's case, (1921) 2 A.C. 200. In any case desires and intentions are things of which a company is incapable. These are the mental operations of its shareholders and officers. The only intention that the company has is such as is expressed in or necessarily follows from its proceedings. It is hardly a paradox to say that the form of a company's resolutions and instruments is their substance. At any rate, in the present case there is no need to distinguish between form and substance in the transaction itself or to refer to desires or intentions, further than to examine what was done, for everything was carried out in plain terms and without concealment. What the requisite majorities of the shareholders desired and intended is pretty plain, too, but that is another matter.

Equally must the Crown fail in its contention that the shareholder is taxable, because at any rate the company distributed money's worth, namely, debenture stock that could be sold. The point was before the House in Blott's Case. Lord Haladane (p. 184) said that the share distributed to the shareholder was "valuable", and Lord Finlay (p. 196), that it was "valueless", but this difference of opinion made no difference in their conclusion. Lord Cave (p. 199) expressly deals with it, saying that the shareholder no doubt got something which he could sell, but if he did so he would be selling a capital asset, producing income (p. 200). The fact is that money's worth is not a material circumstance until the bonus distributed has been shown when still in the company's hands and at the time of distribution to be impressed with the character of income of the company. If it is not, the bonus does not attract tax as part of super-tax payer's income, even though he spends it, when he gets it exactly as he spends his taxable income.

My Lords, the highest authorities have always recognised that the subject is entitled so to arrange his affairs as not to attract taxes imposed by the Crown, so far as he can do so within the law, and that he may legitimately claim the advantage of any express terms or of any omissions that he can find in his favour in taxing Acts. In so doing, he neither comes under liability nor incurs blame. It may be a question, however, whether these considerations of justice and public policy apply equally to a limited liability company, a creature of the law strictly controlled by statute, in a case where it has no interest in either payment of or escape from a tax that is not levied upon it. In this case a sum of £64,464-5, part of the profits of the current year 1914, has been dealt with apart from the undivided accumulations, an amount sufficient in itself to have paid a dividend on the issued ordinary shares of 25 per cent. or 5s. in the pound for every pound paid up, and by the use of "mere machinery" it has been converted into debenture stock, not redeemable under normal circumstances for six years certain. This is valid as against all the world, because Bouch

v. Sproule now applies to revenue cases and because, under Blott's Case, the mere decision of the company, operating through voting majorities, whose private motives and interests may have been no concern of the company at all, has this effect. If any part of the dividends of the year can be so converted, I presume all could be, nor, if a six years' currency of the debenture stock is permissible, do I see why six weeks should be less so. How far this position is tolerable is, however, a matter for the Legislature. It is not material here, but I think it may well be doubted whether, in the long run, it should be permissible for a limited liability company to create obligations, for which no consideration has been given to it, or to increase its paid-up share capital out of its own assets, without imposing on the holders of this additional share capital the usual obligations, which are involved in the subscription of shares", Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Fisher's Executors, 10 Tax Cases 645; (1926) A.C. 395.

It would appear, however, from Lord Cave's judgment that he applied the principle of Blott's Case because, though the debenture was redeemable it was not likely to be redeemed and was not redeemable in the ordinary course for the next six years. If the debentures had been redeemable on short notice the decision may have been different, e.g., it might have been held that income arose when the debentures were paid off.

Mr. Whitmore owned the whole of the ordinary capital and he and his wife the bulk of the preference capital in Whitmores, Ltd., the rest of the shares being held by their close relatives. The company had a large accumulation of undivided profits which it distributed partly as paid-up shares in the company and partly as debentures. Following Blott's Case the Crown did not seek to tax the value of the bonus shares. Held, following Fisher's Case, that the value of the debentures was not taxable, Whitmore v. Commissioners, Inland Revenue, 5 A.T.C. 1; 10 Tax Cases 645.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"He has not received a payment of the debt but he has become an acknowledged creditor, a secured creditor, instead of having an interest in the profits . . . the Court of Appeal have held that for the purposes of a payment of this kind capital is to include loan capital in the application in Blott's Case, 8 Tax Cases 101. . . . It is said (by the Crown) that Fisher's Case, 10 Tax Cases 302, is distinguishable . . . because there, as in Blott's Case, the indications were that the company wanted to keep the money. Here . . . the company . . . merely wanted to turn it into debenture capital for a span and then pay off the debenture capital soon. Now having regard to the two limbs in the decision in Fisher's Case so clearly stressed by Lord Justice Scrutton I do not think it is possible to find any distinction on a consideration of the kind.

It has not been argued before me that it was a finding (of the Commissioners) that these debentures were fictitious, were mere pieces of paper shown to the Inland Revenue and that the real transaction was that the profits were to be distributed in cash at any early date. . . . If what is meant is that the company adopted this transaction, being a real transaction, and one which does not make the shareholder liable to super-tax in lieu of another transaction, which would have made him liable that circumstance has no materiality, as many cases show, in a contest of this kind."

The estate of Sir David Yule consisted mainly of holdings in interlocked private companies and the trustees of the estate held either the whole or almost the whole of the capital in them. The companies had large accumulated reserves of undistributed profits, and the trustees, who had to meet heavy death duties on the estate, devised a scheme as follows. In those Companies in which the trustees held all the ordinary shares, there was a bonus issue of debentures to them; and in the others, preferred ordinary shares were first issued to the trustees alone and then there was a bonus issue of debentures in respect of the holding of preferred ordinary capital. The debentures were all redeemed after a short interval. It was held by the Privy Council, following Blott's and Fisher's Cases and distinguishing Swan Brewery v. Rex, (1914) A.C. 231, that the debentures were a capital receipt and not income in the hands of the shareholders and therefore not taxable. The personal motive of individual shareholders, whatever their controlling interest, is irrelevant so long as the company has in fact capitalised its accumulated profits, Mercantile Bank of India, Ltd. (Trustees of Yule) v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1936 I.T.R. 239 (Cal.).

Where a company declared a dividend, not in cash but by a certificate of indebtedness promising to pay the amount with interest before a certain date, it was held that the dividend was received, not when the certificate of indebtedness was given but when it was paid off. Associated Insulation Products, Ltd. v. Golden, 1944 K.B.D. (?) It will be seen from Raja Raghunandan Prasad Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1933 I.T.R. 113 (P.C.); Cross v. London Provincial Trust, 21 Tax Cas. 705 (C.A.) and other rulings referred to under section 13 that a promise to pay is not the same as a payment.

It should be noted however, with reference to all these rulings about debentures, that the definition in the Indian Act of 'dividend' makes these rulings inapplicable.

Bonus shares—Option to receive cash.—In Wright v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 5 A.T.C. 525; (1927) 1 K.B. 333, bonus shares were issued and the shareholders given the option of receiving either cash or shares. The assessee exercised the option in part and received a certain number of shares and a certain amount of cash. Held (by the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of Rowlatt, J.) that the existence of the option did not affect the nature of the bonus which had been capitalised by the company. In Bouch v. Sproule, (1887) 12 A.C. 385, also there was an option though it was not exercised. That decision having been followed in Blott's and Fisher's Cases, the existence of the option could not in Wright's Case make the bonus "income". The Master of the Rolls said: "We have to treat the company as dominant for all purposes."

Bonus shares—Issue of, to employees.—The underlying principle in Bouch v. Sproule and in Blott's Case is that, even though shareholders may have been given the option to take cash, a company has absolute dominion to determine conclusively against the world whether it will withhold distribution of profits, and if it distributes profits, whether as income or capital. But it has no such dominion in regard to what it owes. It must somehow discharge its debts unless it can get a release. It was held therefore, when a manager of a company was paid his remuneration in the shape of additional shares, that the value of the shares was taxable, Parker v. Chapman, 7 A.T.C. 158 (C.A.); 13 Tax Cases 677.

Liquidation—Assets distributed.—A firm held shares in a number of single ship companies. On the sale or loss of its ship each company went into voluntary liquidation and its surplus assets, including reserves set aside out of profits, and other undivided profits, both accumulated and current, were distributed. Held, that on the liquidation of a company undistributed profits can no longer be distinguished from capital and that the portion of the distributed assets, representing undivided profits, was not liable to tax, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Burrell, 9 Tax Cases 27; (1924) 2 K.B. 52.

Per Pollock, M. R.—"These sums have not been distributed to the shareholders as dividends. The voluntary liquidation has deprived the directors of the power of declaring a dividend. The rights of the Crown and the subject must be governed by what is and not what might have been. Further it is a misapprehension, after the liquidator has assumed his duties to continue the distinction between surplus profits and capital."

Per Atkin, L.J.—"But (the liquidator) has no power to capitalise or decapitalise, to distinguish in his distribution between capital and income. His duty is simply to distribute assets. . . . In fact (the shareholder) receives his share of the joint stock, as L.J. Scrutton said in the Blott Case, 8 Tax Cases 101, not income of the property but the property itself."

There are suggestions by the Court of Appeal in the course of argument in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Wright, 11 Tax Cases 181, that the decision in the Burrell Case might not apply to the payment of arrears of dividends by liquidators. The decision in the Burrell Case is largely obsolete because of the subsequent amendment of the law—see Finance Act of 1927. The principle of the above ruling was extended by the Madras High Court by analogy to cases of partnership in which on dissolution each partner receives his share of capital and profits, Commissioner of Income-tax v. P. R. A. L. M. Muthukaruppan Chettiar, 1934 I.T.R. 406; A.I.R. 1934 Mad. 633, but the Privy Council overruled this decision in A.I.R. 1935 P.C. 117; 62 I.A. 203; 58 M. 881; 1935 I.T.R. 208. When a company is dissolved, a shareholder merely gets a share of the assets; on the other hand, when a firm is dissolved, the partners have a right to receive their shares of profits which do not cease to be profits merely because of dissolution. The profits are a first charge on the assets before any amounts due on account of capital can be distributed, Commissioner of Income-tax v. P. R. A. L. M. Muthukaruppan Chettiar, 62 I. A. 203. It should be noted however that the above decision does not cover cases of undrawn profits allowed by consent to remain in the business and increase its capital.

Dividend Equalisation Fund—Receipts from.—Several directors of a limited company, of whom the assessee was one, held between them all the ordinary shares therein. Each year for five years in succession, the company set aside out of profits certain sums as a reserve fund to be at the complete disposal of the directors for the time being, and in particular as a provision for equalising dividends. On the retirement or death of any director a proportionate share of this "Dividend Equalisation Fund" was payable to him or his legal representatives. Some years later, the company authorised the directors to distribute the Fund among the ordinary shareholders "as a funded debt payable at the option of the directors in cash or in fully paid preference shares at par", and four days later the directors resolved to pay the Fund in cash and to credit the amount to which each shareholder (director) was entitled, to his loan account with the company, but no special arrangement was made as to interest on the amounts so credited or for their redemption by the company. The directors' loan accounts were used for crediting their fees, dividends and interest, and they were in the habit of withdrawing varying amounts therefrom from time to time. Interest was allowed on these accounts at 5 per cent. for two years, and thereafter at 6 per cent. Held, that the Dividend Equalisation Fund was receivable by the directors as income on the passing of the resolution authorising the distribution of the Fund and that the assessee's share of the Fund was therefore properly included in computing his total income for super-tax purposes, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blott, 8 Tax Cases 101, distinguished; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Doncaster, 8 Tax Cases 623.

Special dividends carrying obligation to purchase shares with them.—To enable a particular director to withdraw from the management of a company it was arranged that the remaining shareholders, of whom the assessee was one, should be placed in a position to buy the greater part of his shareholding. In order to provide the remaining shareholders with funds for this purpose the directors recommended that £45,000 should be distributed out of the profits of the company by way of special dividend, and the retiring director further agreed to apply the special dividend on his own shares and the cash received for their sale in taking up £45,000 debentures in the company. A few days later the company declared, out of accumulated profits, special dividends on ordinary and preference shares amounting to £60,000 in all, or £45,000 after deduction of income-tax. Prior to the passing of the resolution the assessee signed a letter authorising the directors to use his portion of the special dividend in payment of the consideration money for such of the retiring director's shares as were purchased by him, and similar letters were signed by the other shareholders. With three exceptions the existing shareholders, including the assessee, duly applied their portion of the dividend to the purchase of shares from the retiring director, who in turn duly took up and paid for £45,000 debentures in the company. Held, that the transaction was in no sense a capitalisation of profits, that the special dividend was receivable by the shareholders as income, and that the arrangement, whether binding or not, to apply it in the purchase of other shares in the company, could not affect the liability to tax, Roe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 Tax Cases 613; 131 L.T. 255.

(6-AA) 'earned income' means any income of an assessee who is an individual, Hindu undivided family, unregistered firm or other association of persons not being a company, a local authority, a registered firm or a firm treated as registered under clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23,—

(a) which is chargeable under the head 'salaries', or

(b) which is chargeable under the head "Profits and gains of business, profession or vocation", where the business, profession or vocation is carried on by the assessee, or in the case of a firm, where the assessee is a partner actively engaged in the conduct of the business, profession or vocation; or

(c) which is chargeable, under the head 'Other sources' if it is immediately derived from personal exertion or represents a pension or superannuation or other allowance given to the assessee in respect of his past services or the past services of any deceased person; and includes any such income which, though it is the income of another person, is included in the assessee's income under the provisions of this Act, but does not include any such income which is exempt from tax under sub-section (2) of section 14 or under a notification issued under section 60.

History.—Differentiation in favour of earned income was first introduced in 1945. The Amending Bill, which met with opposition in the Select Committee in respect of some of its other provisions was not proceeded with and the provisions in respect of 'earned income' were given effect to by an Ordinance.

Scheme of allowance.—A part of earned income, determined by the Finance Act from time to time is excluded from total income for purpose of income-tax only; and is thus excluded both from liability to tax and also for rate purposes. See section 15-A, the Amendment to section 16 (1) (a), section 17 (5) and sections 56 and 58. It should be noted that unlike insurance premia (section 15) which are included in total income, though exempt from tax, earned income is both exempt from tax and excluded from total income for the purpose of income-tax. For the purpose of super-tax, however, it is neither exempt nor excluded from total income.

Persons eligible.—From the very nature of the allowance it is obvious that companies and local authorities have to be excluded. A partner in a registered firm or a firm treated as registered under section 23 (5) (b) is an 'individual', and therefore eligible for the allowance. On the other hand, a partner in an unregistered firm or a member of a non-descript association of persons is not eligible for this allowance in respect of his share of profits of the firm or association; see the concluding part of the definition which excludes items covered by section 14 (2).

Exempt income.—Income in Indian States and income exempted under section 60 are also excluded from 'earned income'; for there is no reason why any allowance should be given in respect of income which is not taxable at all.

Computation.—The allowance should be worked out after the income has been worked out with reference to the other provisions of the Act, viz., sections 7 to 12. Cases of marginal relief relating to incomes a little above the margin are dealt with specially in the Finance Act. See notes on section 7 thereof.

'Salaries'.—There must be a relation of master and servant if the payment is to come under this head. Pensions, etc., paid by employers will fall under this clause, while those paid by trustees of pensions, etc., funds will fall under clause (c) 'other sources'.

Business, profession or vocation.—The firm referred to in clause (b) is a registered firm or a firm treated as registered under section 23 (5) (b); otherwise the word “assessee” occurring after the word ‘firm’ would be meaningless in view of the concluding part of the definition which excludes income covered by section 14 (2). The case of an unregistered firm or a non-descript association is covered by the words “carried on by the assessee”, the firm or the association being the assessee in such cases; and it is immaterial for the purpose, whether some of the members or partners are ‘sleeping’ or not, for qua partners or members they are out of the picture altogether. Whether a partner is ‘actively engaged’ in the business, etc., of a firm is obviously a question of fact.

Other sources.—The income must be immediately derived from personal exertion. The immediateness has obviously nothing to do with time but with sequence of operations or activities leading to the springing up of income. This, as well as what is personal exertion must obviously be a question of fact. A dividend in a company or interest on loans for example will clearly not be earned income; so also, income from property or from any kind of passive or quiescent ownership. But special or additional dividends given to working directors as remuneration will be ‘earned’.

Pension, etc.—Pension is of the nature of deferred salary and the definition seeks to protect pensions granted by trustees of pension, etc., funds, which would not be included in ‘salaries’ because the trustees are not the ‘employer’.

Trusts.—Income received by a beneficiary from trustees can clearly not be ‘earned income’. Cf. Inland Revenue v. Shiel's Trustees, 6 Tax Cas. 583 (C.S.); and M'Dougall v. Smith, 1919 P.C., 86, but it will be treated as such if it is included in the income of the beneficiary under section 16 (1) (c).

Income of other persons included.—See sections 16 (1) (c), 16 (3), 23-A and 44-D, et seq. If the income of the assessee is made to include, under other provisions of the Act, the income of others he has also the corresponding benefit in respect of earned income, if other conditions are satisfied and if the income is not exempt under section 14 (2) or by notification under section 60.

(6-B) ‘Firm’, ‘partner’ and ‘partnership’ have the same meanings respectively as in the Indian Partnership Act, 1932: provided that the expression ‘partner’ includes any person who being a minor has been admitted to the benefits of partnership.

History.—This definition was first introduced in 1930, in order to remove doubts which had been suggested—see for example In re Ambalal Sarabhai, 1 I.T.C. 234. Generally speaking, however, even before 1930, the expressions ‘firm’, ‘partner’ and ‘partnership’ as used in the Income-tax Act had in fact been construed by Courts with reference to the definitions in the Indian Contract Act the provisions in which relating to partnership were recodified into a separate Partnership Act in 1932. The proviso was added in 1939.

Before this proviso was added to this definition, minors admitted to the benefits of partnership were eligible for the benefit of set-off of losses under section 24 and for that of refunds under section 48. This proviso makes such minors partners for all the purposes of the Income-tax Act.

Though, under the Partnership Act, a minor partner's liabilities are restricted, he gathers as a consequence of this proviso all the incidents of a partner for income-tax purposes, e.g., in respect of tax due from other partners. See also section 16 (3) under which, in certain circumstances, the income of a minor admitted to the benefits of partnership is treated as the income of the father.

Hindu joint family firms.—See section 5 of the Indian Partnership Act, 1932, which excludes such firms and a Buddhist husband and wife carrying on business as such from the definition of 'partnership', which latter relationship arises from contract and not from status, Ram Lal v. Lakshmi Chand, (1861) 1 B.H.C. App. 11.

Registered firm.—As to the method of assessing a registered firm, see notes under section 2 (14); as regards the procedure for registering a firm, see notes under section 26-A.

Unregistered firm.—See notes under section 2 (16).

Firm—What is a.—There is no such thing as a firm known to the law, Ex parte Corbett, (1880) 14 Ch. 122, though in Scotland, a firm is recognised as a separate entity, i.e., a different legal person from the partners. All the same a 'firm' is recognised in commercial practice as a separate entity apart from its partners; and the Income-tax Act recognises this. See also Ex parte Chippendale, (1853) De G. M. & G. 19 (36).

"It is argued by the Commissioner that a partnership is for income-tax purposes an entity; but it is not an entity known to the law; it is not a separate entity like a company limited by shares; its name is merely a convenient method of describing its partners each of whom is jointly and severally liable for its debts and for income-tax purposes it is a convenient body to assess, as the partners carry on trade together and keep books in which the partnership transactions are entered and earn together profits or make losses. It is to be observed, that for this purpose no distinction can be made between registered and unregistered firms, for whether a firm is a legal entity or not does not depend on registration," per Schwabe, C.J., in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Mr. Ar. Ar. Arunachalam Chetti, 1 I.T.C. 278; 47 Mad. 660.

The new Partnership Act adheres to the view that a firm is not a legal person.

Section 239 of the Indian Contract Act was as below:—

"'Partnership' is the relation which subsists between persons who have agreed to combine their property, labour or skill in some business, and to share the profits thereof between them."

"Persons who have entered into partnership with one another are called collectively a 'firm'."

The corresponding definitions in the Indian Partnership Act, 1932, are as below:—

"'Partnership' is the relation between persons who have agreed to share the profits of a business carried on by all or any of them acting for all.

Persons who have entered into partnership with one another are called individually 'partners' and collectively 'a firm', and the name under which their business is called the 'firm name'."

To quote the comment of the Special Committee (which prepared the Draft Partnership Bill) the new definition contains three distinct elements:

- (1) There must be an agreement entered into by all the persons concerned, (2) the agreement must be to share the profits of a business (a trade, occupation or profession), and (3) the business must be carried on by all or any of the persons concerned acting for all.

The element of sharing of losses was omitted as a pre-requisite since it may be regarded as consequential on the sharing of profits, i.e., on the relation of a partnership, established otherwise.

Persons who have no mutual rights and obligations do not constitute an association because they happen to have a common interest or several interests in something which is to be divided between them, Smith v. Anderson, (1880) 15 Ch. D. 247. If the shares are distinct and separately transferable, there would only be a co-ownership and not a partnership which can only arise if there is a common business and sharing of profits. Thus the joint proprietorship in defined shares of a house let to tenants would not be a 'partnership' but if the house was used as a hotel under their own management, a partnership would arise in regard to hotel keeping, French v. Styling, (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 357. Part-owners of a ship are not necessarily partners, Helme v. Smith, (1837) 7 Bing. 709, but if they employ the ship in trade or adventure on joint account they are partners as to that employment and the profit made, Green v. Brings, (1847) 6 Ha. 395. Even the joint acquisition of property avowedly for purposes of profit does not make the matter necessarily one of partnership, London Financial Association v. Kelk, (1884) 26 Ch. D. 107. Sharing gross profits will not result in a partnership, Lyon v. Knowles, (1863) 3 B. & S. 556.

Just as common interest will not in itself create a partnership without a division of profits, so sharing of profits will not unless there is really a common business. Although a right to participate in profits is a strong test of partnership, there may be cases where, upon a simple participation of profits, there is a presumption, not of law, but of fact, that there is a partnership; yet whether the relation of partnership does or does not exist must depend on the whole contract between the parties, and that circumstance is not conclusive, Ross v. Parkyns, (1875) L.R. Eq. 331; Cox v. Hickman, (1860) 8 H.L.C. 268; Mollow March & Co. v. Court of Wards, (1872) L.R. 4 P.C. 419. Where a coal-merchant and an importer arranged informally that for some time the importer would invoice coal at cost and that half the profits made by the merchant would be given to the importer, it was held that there was a partnership, John Gardner and Bowring Hardy & Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 15 Tax Cases 602. On the other hand, when the (outgoing) vendor of a doctor's practice gave the purchaser three months' introduction and the two worked together, it was held that there was no partnership, Pratt v. Strick, 17 Tax Cases 459.

It is not easy to draw the line between a partnership and a payment of salary by a share of profits, Steel v. Lester, (1877) 2 C.P.D. 121. Sharing losses is a strong prima facie test of partnership, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Baboo Sahib & Sons, 2 I.T.C. 502. But it is even possible for a person both to receive a share of the profits in another man's business and share his losses and yet be only a servant of the other person. It would all depend on the terms of the agreement between the two, Walker v. Hirsch, (1884) 27 Ch. D. 460.

Many of the above rulings have now been codified in the Indian Partnership Act as below:

Section 5. The relation of partnership arises from contract and not from status; and, in particular, the members of a Hindu undivided family carrying on a family business as such, or a Burmese Buddhist husband and wife carrying on business as such are not partners in such business.

Section 6. In determining whether a group of persons is or is not a firm or whether a person is or is not a partner in a firm, regard shall be had to the real relation between the parties, as shown by all relevant facts taken together.

Explanation 1.—The sharing of profits or of gross returns arising from property by persons holding a joint or common interest in that property does not of itself make such persons partners.

Explanation 2.—The receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business, or of a payment contingent upon the earning of profits or varying with the profits earned by a business, does not of itself make him a partner with the persons carrying on the business; and in particular, the receipt of such share or payment—(a) by a lender of money to persons engaged or about to engage in any business, (b) by a servant or agent as remuneration, (c) by the widow or child of a deceased partner, as annuity, or (d) by a previous owner or part owner of the business, as consideration for the sale of the goodwill or share thereof, does not of itself make the receiver a partner with the persons carrying on the business.

A selling association which was formed by an agreement between certain ice manufacturing concerns in order to prevent under-selling by constituent firms, and which had the entire control over manufacture, sales, etc., and distributed the profits between constituent members, was held to be a 'firm', and the fact that the constituent firms made heavy losses because of the controlled prices was held to be irrelevant, Lucknow Ice Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 156. A similar ruling was given by the Lahore High Court also in Khushiram—Dukhbanjan—Tekchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 298.

A deed of partnership purporting to show merely the shares of the partners (in this case a mother and her minor children) without disclosing the business or the assets or the source of income and with no indication as to how the infants combined their property, labour or skill was considered not to have brought a firm into existence. In re Bai Sukinaboo, A.I.R. 1932 Bom. 116; 6 I.T.C. 13.

Where one man supplied all the capital and bore all the losses, and he and his attorneys had the control of the business including the power to alter the shares of profits of the other persons and even dismiss them, it was held that the relation was one of master and servants, and not a partnership, Mahomed Kasim Rowther v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 54 M.L.J. 219 (F.B.). The mere fact, however, that a person shares only the profits and not the losses will not by itself negative the existence of a partnership, British Cotton Growers' Association, Punjab, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1937 I.T.R. 279.

The law looks only to the shares in the partnership business and not to the actual receipts of each partner from it; therefore, a partnership under which the shares of the gumashta partners are specified but the actual allocation depends on other factors, such as the time devoted to the business, is a valid partnership, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Seth Mangumal Lunida Singh, 1939 I.T.R. 208.

The cessation of active business cannot of itself extinguish a firm if it continues for other purposes, e.g., collection of outstandings and payment of liabilities, Gopu Balakrishnayya and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 7 I.T.C. 276.

There can be no partnership between a Hindu undivided family and one of its own undivided members, Lokenath Prasad Dandhania v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1940 I.T.R. 369; nor between a guardian in his individual capacity and his minor wards represented by himself. In re Mohanlal Shyamal, 1942 I.T.R. 219 (All.). If a member of a Hindu undivided family makes a contribution from his separate funds to the family business, that may be a loan advanced to the family and entitled to interest but there can be no partnership as a consequence. In re Lackhmandas, 1944 I.T.R. 335 (Lah.).

Once a wakf is created, all rights of property vest in the Almighty who, being non-personal, cannot enter into partnership with a material person: a partnership therefore purporting to treat a wakf as a partner represented by the mutawali is not a partnership in law, Hoosan Kaseem Dada v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1937 I.T.R. 182. A person cannot, at one and the same point of time, be a partner in a firm in his individual capacity and also a partner in it in his representative capacity, 1937 I.T.R. 162.

Prohibited partnerships.—Both in England and in India the number of persons who may form an ordinary partnership is limited. See section 4 of the Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913). Under section 23 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872) the consideration or object of an agreement is unlawful if it defeats the provisions of any law, and the agreement is void. Therefore a partnership which is prohibited under the Companies Act will not be recognised as such by the Income-tax Officer. But he can tax profits from illegal or unlawful transactions. See notes under sections 3 and 4 (3) (vi).

Firms as partners.—After reviewing the following cases., viz., Seodoyal Khemka v. Joharmull Moumull, 50 Cal. 549; Brojo Lal Saha Banikya v. Budh Nath Pyarilal, 55 Cal. 551; Basanti Bibi v. Babulal Poddar, 1930 A.L.J. 1517; Kader Bux Omer Hyat v. Sukt Behari, 36 C.W.N. 489, the Allahabad High Court ruled in Jaidayal Madan Gopal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1933 I.T.R. 186, that a firm cannot legally be a partner in another firm. Therefore, if there is a so-called partnership between two firms and a Hindu undivided family and the share of members of the firm are not mentioned in the partnership deed, the union as a whole is not a firm but an association of individuals for the purpose of taxation, Mian Channu Factories Union v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1936 I.T.R. 203; A.I.R. 1936 Lah. 48. The ruling in Jaidayal Madan Gopal Case, 1933 I.T.R. 186, applies to all firms, whether registered or not; and there can be no partnership in strict law between a firm and a Hindu, undivided family, Parbhu Lal Piyorilal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1935 I.T.R. 197 (All.).

In Chandrikaprasad Ramswarup v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1939 I.T.R. 269, the Allahabad High Court held that, though a firm as such cannot enter into a partnership with another firm (because a firm as such is not a legal entity), the larger partnership formed by the two firms can be a partnership in law between the members of the two individual firms and that even if the larger partnership was illegal, the income assessable to tax is the actual income of the individual or of a firm irrespective of the manner in which the income was derived and of the legality or otherwise of that manner.

Partnerships how taxed.—Under section 3 a firm or its partners individually are chargeable; under section 14, a partner in an unregistered firm is not taxable in respect of his share of profits if the firm has been taxed; under section 23 (5) a registered firm as such (apart from the partners) is not ordinarily taxed, and the Income-tax Officer, at his discretion, may treat an unregistered firm as though it was registered.

Different partnerships.—The same persons can enter into more than one partnership under the same deed; and it is a question of fact of the construction of the partnership deed whether there is only one partnership or not, Krishna Ginning Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 334. The mere fact that two different ventures belong to the same persons and in the same proportions does not necessarily make the two partnerships identical; on the other hand, the fact that the ventures were called by different names would not in itself make them separate. The test is whether in substance and in truth the business of the two ventures can be held to be so connected as to form a single business, In re Martin & Co., 4 I.T.C. 478; A.I.R. 1929 Cal. 753.

Firm—Residence of.—The 'residence' of a firm under the law as it stood before 1939 was determined by the same considerations as the residence of a company, i.e., largely by the seat of the directing power behind the business and not by the physical residence of the individual partners. See notes under section 4 (2) T. S. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 50 Mad. 847; 2 I.T.C. 310. Since 1st April, 1939, section 4-A (c) lays down that a firm "is resident in British India unless the control and management of its affairs is situated wholly without British India": See notes under the latter section.

Partnership of Wife and Husband.—In in re Ambalal Sarabhai, 1 I.T.C. 234, it was held that a partnership between a husband and wife in which the husband was almost everything in the concern—having the sole control of the management, the power of determining the partnership and of admitting new partners—was a valid partnership.

Per Shah, C.J.—"There is nothing in the document to exclude the idea of combining her property, labour or skill in the business of the firm. Indeed the papers sent up with the reference tend to show that she did agree to render herself liable to the Bank as a partner of this firm along with her husband. That involves the idea of contributing property to the business of the firm. . . . When the parties agree to become partners it is not necessary to state in terms that they agree to combine property, labour or skill. That may be implied and in the present case I see nothing to exclude the idea of combining property, labour or skill when and so far as necessary between the partners. The fact that the control is kept with Mr. Ambalal and that he has certain extra rights as a major partner does not in any sense negative a partnership according to law. It is open to two partners to agree, on the lines on which they have agreed in this case, to allow the business of the partnership to be conducted by one of the partners."

If the Income-tax Officer had found the partnership to be bogus in fact, he could presumably have ignored it.

"This reference has been made on the footing that the document evidences a real transaction between the parties. The learned Advocate-General has not suggested, and I do not think that on this reference it could be suggested, that the document does not evidence a real transaction between the parties to the document. But he contends that the question of law that arises is whether on a proper construction of this document the two persons are constituted partners in law," A.I.R. 1924 Bom. 182; 1 I.T.C. 234.

Bogus firms.—The Income-tax Officer can refuse to recognise a firm if he has reason to think that the instrument of partnership is not genuine. There should be a firm before the Income-tax Officer can register it; and the mere existence of an instrument of partnership will not in itself bring a partnership into existence if there is really no partnership, Dickinson v. Gross, 6 A.T.C. 551; 11 Tax Cases 614; In re Biswaswarlal Brijlal, 57 Cal. 1336. On a question of fact the finding could not be questioned by the High Court so long as there is evidence to permit of such finding, see Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sansom, 8 Tax Cases 20; Jacobs v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (C.S.), 4 A.T.C. 543; 10 Tax Cases 1; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Whitmore (K.B.D.), 5 A.T.C. 1; Sir Dinshaw Petit v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 55, all cases of 'one man' concerns in which it has been held that the Income-tax Officer can go behind the documents and accounts if the facts and circumstances of the case justify his doing so. See also Hawker v. Compton, 8 Tax Cases 306, in which the Commissioners held that no partnership existed and Morden Rigg & Co., etc. v. Monks, 8 Tax Cases 450, in which the Commissioners held that a partnership existed. In all these cases the Courts declined to interfere on the ground that the findings were of fact. It is clear that in the absence of an instrument of partnership the onus falls on the assessee of proving the existence of a partnership.

An arrangement between a financier and an active worker to share profits and losses in developing a piece of land was held to be a partnership even though the relative correspondence stated in terms that the arrangement "shall not constitute a partnership" Fluston v. Johnston, 19 A.T.C. 62 (K.B.).

"You do not constitute or create or prove a partnership by saying that there is one. The only proof that a partnership exists is proof of the relations of agency and of community in losses and profits and of the sharing in one form or another of the capital of the concern. . . ."
Per L. J. Clyde in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Williamson, 14 Tax Cases 335. In that case the facts were as follows: There was no deed of partnership. Father and sons leased a farm jointly. The father supplied capital, controlled the bank account which stood in his name and also purchases and sales. He gave moneys to the sons from time to time—not regular shares. No account was kept of the farm. The business was claimed to be a partnership at will, which the Commissioners accepted. The Court of Session held that there was no evidence to justify that there was a partnership.

Under a contract between a father and his children the latter who worked in the business were to share profits equally, the father's interest being limited to the sums advanced and interest thereon; the children were to draw wages but no share of profits until the father's advances were repaid. The father had the sole control of the business and was the only person allowed to operate on the firm's bank account: Held, that the father was the sole owner of the business, Ayrshire Pullman Motor Service and Ritchie v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Tax Cases 754.

Whether or not a person is a partner in a firm is a question of fact. Hukumchand Dunichand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1941 I.T.R. 616. The Court will not, however, accept a finding based on mere suspicion. Where there were two closely connected firms with several common partners and close interconnection in respect of transactions, and in one of them the assessee and his minor son were among the partners and in the other two of his minor sons, the Income-tax Department claimed, without any further evidence beyond the fact of partnership, to treat the minor sons as mere nominees of the father but the High Court disallowed the claim Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Gokulchand Hukumchand, 1943 I.T.R. 462.

In the case of an unregistered firm, which the Income-tax Officer finds to be not genuine, that is, if the Income-tax Officer finds that there is no firm in existence in fact but only in name, it would apparently be open to the Income-tax Officer to ignore the firm and treat the profits of the firm as the profits of the real proprietor of the firm. That is to say, in ascertaining the 'total income' of the partners, the Income-tax Officer will go by the real interests of the partners and not the alleged interests.

Whether a partnership has been dissolved or not is also a question of fact and it is open to the Income-tax Officer to ignore an alleged dissolution if in fact it is not true. So, when an individual doing business in partnership with others claimed, in the course of proceedings under section 34 against him that the partnership had been dissolved retrospectively for over six months and in support, produced a registered deed of dissolution of partnership dated two days before its production before the Income-tax Officer, and the deed contained false and contradictory statements, and the accounts showed that even after the alleged dissolution the partners were receiving their shares of the profits of the business, the Allahabad High Court held that there was evidence on which the Income-tax authorities could find that the alleged dissolution was not true, In re Lala Tribeniram, 1938 I.T.R. 510. Rules 4 and 6-B as amended in 1939 incorporate the substance of some of the foregoing decisions.

Non-distribution of profits.—Notwithstanding the fact that certain assessee, three brothers who lived and messed together, kept no accounts, no separate ledgers and did not draw on the profits more than to a limited extent for their maintenance, it was held in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Kekabhai and others, A.I.R. 1930 Nag. 6, that the assessee were entitled to be registered as a firm. The reasoning was as follows: It is not a necessary condition of partnership under section 239 of the Contract Act that the profits should be divided at a particular time; nor does the certificate in the application under the Income-tax Rules require the profits to be divided within a particular limit of time. If a firm is a firm under the Contract Act and if the certificate is given in good faith, the Commissioner of Income-tax should register the firm.

See, however, section 28 (2) which gives power to the Income-tax Officer to levy a penalty if the profits of a registered firm have been distributed otherwise than in accordance with the instrument of partnership produced before the Income-tax Officer as governing the distribution so that revenue is lost.

Both sections 14 and 16 make it clear that the share of profits of a partner is to be included in his total income irrespective of whether he has actually received them or not. The English Law on this subject (see proviso to section 20, Income-tax Act, 1918) is almost similar; see also per Horridge, J., in Gaunt v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1913) 3 K.B. 395 and Rowlatt, J., in Blott v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 Tax Cases at p. 111. Further, in British India the partners of a firm seeking registration have to certify under Rule 3 that they have received or will receive their respective shares of profits.

Evasion of tax—Unregistered firms.—See section 23 (5) under which the Income-tax Officer can treat an unregistered firm as though it was registered, if he finds that the Crown will obtain more tax by treating it as registered.

(6-C) "Income" includes anything included in 'dividend' as defined in clause (6-A) and anything which under Explanation 2 to sub-section (1) of section 7 is a profit received in lieu of salary for the purposes of that sub-section and any sum deemed to be profits under the second proviso to clause (vii) of sub-section (2) of section 10 and the profits of any business of insurance carried on by a mutual insurance association computed in accordance with Rule 9 in the Schedule:

History.—This definition was first introduced in 1939, and the word 'company' altered to 'association' in 1940.

Income.—The word 'income' in its ordinary usage excludes everything in the nature of capital; and the special definition in this clause expands the ordinary meaning of the word so as to include four specific cases which, in the absence of the definition would fall under 'capital' or will be a mere repayment of excess paid, viz., (1) 'dividend' as defined under clause (6-A); (2) profits in lieu of salary under the Explanation to section 7 (1); (3) sale proceeds of discarded machinery and plant; and (4) profits of mutual insurance associations. Were it not for this definition, the first three items would be capital and the last might be held to be a repayment of excess payments.

As regards (1), see notes under clause (6-A); as regards (2), see Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Fletcher, A.I.R. 1937 P.C. 261; 1937 I.T.R. 428 (under section 7) which is nullified by this definition; as regards (3), see notes under section 10 (2) (vii); and as regards (4), see notes under section 3 as to 'Mutual' concerns. See also section 10 (6) regarding the taxation of profits of trade, professional or similar associations, to which, however, there is no reference in this definition. As regards profits of business of insurance carried on by a mutual insurance association, see notes under rule 9 of schedule [and section 10 (7)].

It will be seen that the Act, and more particularly the extensive amendments of 1939 use the word 'income' sometimes as including 'income, profits and gains', i.e., in contradistinction to capital (and repayments in mutual concerns) and sometimes as distinguished from profits and gains, i.e., the latter referring to a business, profession or vocation and the former to most other sources. In this definition clause it is obviously used in the former, more comprehensive sense.

As to rulings and dicta about Capital and Income generally, see notes under section 3, and as to economic concepts on the subject, see the Introduction.

(6-D) "Inspecting Assistant Commissioner" means a person appointed to be an Inspecting Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax under section 5;

History.—This clause was inserted in 1939. See notes under clause (3).

Functions.—See sub-sections (5) and (6) of section 5, sections 23-A, 28 and 53. The main functions, however, are intended to be extra-statutory, viz., inspectorial and advisory, as will be seen from the Enquiry Committee's Report, 1936.

(7) "Income-tax Officer" means a person appointed to be an Income-tax Officer under section 5;

See notes under section 5.

(8) "Magistrate" means a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class, or a Magistrate of the second class specially empowered by the Central Government to try offences against this Act;

Magistrate.—The words "specially empowered by the Local Government to try offences against this Act" were introduced in 1918. The word 'Central' was substituted for 'Local' by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

(9) "Person" includes a Hindu undivided family and a local authority;

Person.—In the 1886 Act 'person' was defined as including a firm and a Hindu undivided family. The definition was given up in the 1918 Act as being covered by the definition in the General Clauses Act. The Select Committee added the present definition in 1922 so as to make the position clear. See also notes under "Assessee" [section 2 (2)]. The reference to a local authority was added in 1939 in view of the liability of such an authority to tax under the revised clause (iii) of section 4 (3). As to a Hindu undivided family, see below. As to whether a person includes an 'infant', see notes under section 40 and R. v. Newmarket Commissioners (Ex parte Huxley), 7 Tax Cases 49; (1916) 1 K.B. 788.

Family—Unit of taxation.—A Hindu undivided family is a separate entity for income-tax purposes, being ordinarily represented by the karta or manager. Under section 14 the income received from that of the family by a member is excluded from his total income. He is neither taxable on what he receives nor can what he receives affect the rates of tax on other income (see sub-section (1) of section 16). Nor can he get a refund of tax in respect of it. Under the Finance Act, the rates of tax applicable to a Hindu undivided family may be different from those applicable to an individual.

Hindu Undivided Family.—For the purposes of income-tax law the main questions of Hindu Law are what constitutes a Hindu undivided family and what kinds of property and income belong to such a family as distinguished from its individual members. No definition of a Hindu undivided family has been attempted in the Act nor is a simple definition possible. The law on the subject is governed by various sacred books of the Hindus, commentaries on and digests of these books, by custom and by rulings of Civil Courts, including of course those of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The main feature about a Hindu undivided family is that it is a coparcenary or tenancy in common, but such coparcenary or tenancy arises by law among certain relatives of stated degrees including relations by adoption and cannot be created by voluntary contract among strangers or relatives not of the stated degree.

The Calcutta High Court held in In re Moolji Sicka and others, 1935 I.T.R. 123, that the Hindu undivided family contemplated by the Income-tax Act was merely a Hindu coparcenary and not the family in its wider sense, and this view was dissented from by the Bombay High Court which in Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Gomedalli Lakshmi Narain, 1935 I.T.R. 367, following Madras, Vedathanni v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1933 I.T.R. 70, held that the expression referred to the family in the wider sense. Both the cases went up to the Privy Council who observed that the phrase "Hindu undivided family" was used in the statute with reference, not to one school of Hindu Law but to all schools, and that it was, therefore, a mistake to paste over the wider words of the Act the words "Hindu coparcenary"—all the more that it is not possible to say on the face of the Act that no female can be a member. The Bombay High Court on the other hand having held that an assessee, his wife and mother, were a Hindu undivided family arrived too readily at the conclusion that the income was the income of the family.

A Hindu undivided family includes all persons lineally described from a common ancestor and includes their wives and unmarried daughters, while a coparcenary includes only those who acquire by birth an interest in the joint or coparcenary property. Therefore a widow of a male member receiving maintenance is a member of the family. Channan Devi v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1944 I.T.R. 153.

According to the Privy Council the words "income of" are simple words capable of a wider or a narrower meaning; and for the purpose of income-tax and super-tax under sections 3 and 55 income is not to be attributed, to any one of the five classes of persons mentioned, by any loose or extended interpretation of the words, but only where the application of the words is warranted by their ordinary legal meaning. The relevant meaning in the case before the Privy Council was the ordinary meaning in Hindu Law according to the Benares School. In an extra-legal sense and even for some purposes of legal theory, ancestral property may perhaps be described as family property; but it does not follow that in the eye of the Hindu Law, it belongs, save in certain circumstances, to the family as distinct from the individual. By reason of its origin, a man's property may be liable to be diverted wholly or in part on the happening of a particular event or may be answerable for particular obligations or may pass at his death in a particular way but if in spite of all this his personal law regards him as the owner, the property is his property and the income, therefore, is his income, i.e., that of an individual. It would not be in consonance with ordinary notions or with a correct interpretation of the Mitakshara law to hold that property which a man has obtained from his father belongs to a Hindu undivided family by reason of his having a wife and daughter, Kalyanji Vithaldas, etc. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1937 I.T.R. 90; (1937) 1 Cal. 653; 64 I.A. 28; Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. A. P. Swamy Gomedalli, 1937 I.T.R. 416; A.I.R. 1937 P.C. 239. See also Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Vednath Singh, 1940 I.T.R. 222 in which a Hindu (Mitakshara) died leaving property to his only son whose mother and sister, however, were still alive; and it was held, following Kalyanji Vithaldas's Case, that the son was assessable as an individual.

As a consequence of the above Privy Council rulings, the following instructions have been laid down by the Central Board of Revenue:—

(a) The son of a Hindu (governed by any school of Hindu law) does not acquire by birth any interest in his father's self-acquired property. In respect of the income of such property the father is to be assessed as an individual. (b) In the case of Hindus not governed by the Dayabhaga law the son acquires by birth an interest in his father's ancestral property and therefore after the birth of a son the income from ancestral property is to be assessed as the income of a Hindu undivided family. According to the Dayabhaga law, however, the son does not acquire by birth any interest in ancestral property. His rights arise for the first time on his father's death. In the father's lifetime, therefore, the income from ancestral property is to be assessed as the income of an individual unless the father himself is a member of a coparcenary. (c) The income of a sole surviving male member of a Hindu undivided family governed by the Mitakshara law is to be assessed as his personal income if he has no son. The existence of a wife and daughters does not alter the position. Under the Dayabhaga law the position is different. According to that law a coparcenary is formed only when the inheritance opens, and there must be two or more male heirs before a coparcenary can be formed. But if any of these male coparceners dies leaving surviving him a widow or a daughter that widow or daughter would be admitted into the coparcenary in the place of the deceased coparcener. As for example, a Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga law dies leaving three sons A, B and C. The three sons, A, B and C, inherit the property jointly and form a coparcenary (although each inherits a defined share). If before partitioning their shares, B dies leaving a widow BW and C dies leaving a daughter CD, then A, BW and CD will be members of the coparcenary originally formed by A, B and C. It will thus be seen that the Dayabhaga law differs from the Mitakshara in admitting females into the coparcenary in certain circumstances although they cannot originally form a coparcenary. A coparcenary is a fortiori an undivided Hindu family and the income from the coparcenary property will, according to the Dayabhaga law, be assessable as the income of an undivided Hindu family notwithstanding that such coparcenary consists of only one male member and one or more female members. (d) The income from ancestral property of a Hindu (governed by any school of law) with no son but with a wife and/or daughters is to be assessed as the income of an individual.

It would be inconsistent with the interpretation of the law of the Dayabhaga as of the law of the Mitakshara to hold that property which a man has obtained from his father belongs to a Hindu undivided family by reason of his having a wife and/or daughters. Indeed since under the Dayabhaga law a son has no greater right in his father's property than that of maintenance during his minority and the father is the absolute owner of property devolving upon him, even the existence of a son will not make the income of the property in the father's hands the income of an undivided family.

It will be seen that, where there is only one male member, he will be treated as an individual, and also that what a female member receives as maintenance is received by her as a member of the family within the meaning of section 14.

After the decision of the Privy Council in Kalyanji Vithaldas's Case, the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act became law. Whether section 3 of that Act makes a widow a coparcener in the full sense of the word or not, she clearly obtains an interest in the joint family property. Therefore a family composed of a male member with a wife and undivided step-mother is a Hindu undivided family and the male member must not be assessed as an individual. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. A. V. R. MR. M. Lakshmanan Chettiar, 1940 I.T.R. 545. In a case, anterior to the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act in which a widow of the last surviving coparcener adopted a son, who also died issueless, leaving a widow, it was held that the two widows together did not constitute a Hindu undivided family and that the property was that of the mother-in-law individually, notwithstanding her liability to maintain the daughter-in-law. Panna Bai v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C. P., 1943 I.T.R. 154.

Non-Hindus.—Jains are Hindus for the purpose of the income-tax law in the absence of custom or usage to the contrary. See the following rulings: Chotoylal v. Chunnolal, L.R. 6 I.A. 15; Bachibi v. Makhanlal, 3 All. 55; Ambabai v. Govind, 23 Bom. 257 and Nathu Sa Parsu Sa Lad v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C. P., 7 I.T.C. 129. So also, Sikhs. If Jains or Sikh joint families do not wish to be treated as Hindu undivided families, it is for them (according to the Income-tax Manual) to prove the existence of a custom or usage to the contrary. The Income-tax Manual also directs that joint families of Moslems who follow Hindu Law in regard to succession, e.g., Khojas and Cutchi Memons are not to be treated as Hindu families for the purpose of this Act.

The members of a Mitakshara family, after a preliminary decree for partition has been made and before partition, are in the same position as a Dayabhaga family and can be individually assessed in respect of their shares, In re Keshardeo Chamria, 1937 I.T.R. 246 (Cal.).

The law assumes that the normal status of a Hindu family is one of jointness in residence and estate. The presumption in law, therefore, is that a Hindu family is undivided and it is for the person claiming any advantage for the purpose of tax to prove the contrary. The law also presumes that property once joint continues as such until the contrary is proved. Other presumptions are that property acquired by or in possession of a joint member is joint property, and that the property acquired with the nucleus of joint property is joint unless the acquirer has been separated from the family. All these presumptions, however, apply only in the case of male members of the family. If the property belongs to a female member, the position is different as will be seen in what follows about 'stridhanam'.

Section 25-A of the Income-tax Act lays down in terms that unless an order has been passed by the Income-tax Officer under that section that a Hindu family has been divided, such family shall be deemed to continue as an undivided family.

A partition can be effected in several ways: by decree of a Court, by a Deed of Partition (which under the Registration and Transfer of Property Acts must be registered if it involves immovable property over Rs. 100 in value) by a Deed of Release from a member relinquishing his right to the joint property, by an agreement—oral or written—among the members to remain separate or even a formal declaration by one member that he will remain separate, by actually remaining separate for 12 years and by the conversion of a member to an alien faith. Self-acquired property, however, if it includes immovable property, e.g., buildings of a factory (in India such property does not include machinery) cannot be transferred, except by a registered instrument, under the Transfer of Property Act, In re Sir Sundar Singh Majithia, 1938 I.T.R. 336 (All.) ; I.L.R. 1938 All. 638; A.I.R. 1938 All. 452.

The family may be partitioned but not the properties, which may be managed and shared in common. At the same time a family cannot be joint if the property has been divided. Even if the property remains joint, if the family is divided in status the acquisition of the members is individual and not joint property. See however section 25-A under which, for the purpose of income-tax, what matters is the division of the property, and not merely a divided status.

It is also open to a family to arrange to enjoy a portion of the family property jointly but in specific shares and the arrangement at once becomes a voluntary contract outside Hindu law and is no longer subject to the incidents of Hindu family coparcenership. There is also nothing to prevent a member of a Hindu undivided family from earning on his own account without putting the earnings into the common stock, but once he puts it into the common stock it becomes the family property and not his own.

Income from separate and self-acquired property not put into the common stock is the income of the individual even though he may have undivided sons since they have no interest in such income, In re Kalyandas Vithaldas and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1937 I.T.R. 90; 64 I.A. 28.

The Income-tax Manual instructs income-tax authorities that "where the income, profits and gains of a member of a Hindu undivided family consist of his personal earnings and acquisitions by his own exertions, they must be treated as his personal income and not as joint family income, unless they flow from the employment in business or otherwise of the joint family property."

The following is an extract from the Calcutta High Court judgment, in the case of In re Ganga Sagar Anandamohan Shaha, A.I.R. 1930 Cal. 178; 4 I.T.C. 55; 33 C.W.N. 1190 (F.B.).

"Now, every Hindu family is presumed to be joint in food, worship and estate. Under the Dayabhaga law each coparcener takes a defined share. The essence of a coparcenary under the Mitakshara law is unity of ownership whereas under the Dayabhaga law the essence of a coparcenary is unity in possession. So long as there is unity of possession, no coparcener can say that a particular share of the property belongs to him. That he can say only after a partition. Partition then, according to the Dayabhaga law, consists in splitting up joint possession and assigning specific portions of the property to the several coparceners. But there is no presumption that a family, because it is joint, possesses joint property or any property. Where there is joint estate and the members of the family become separate in estate, the family ceases to be joint. Mere severance in food and worship does not operate as a separation. Cesser in commensality is an element which may properly be considered in determining the question whether there has been a partition, but it is not conclusive, Chowdhry Ganesh Dutt v. Mt. Jewach, 31 I.A. 10; 31 Cal. 262; Ranganatha Rao v. Narayanasami, 31 Mad. 482. If, however, after cesser in commensality any member of the family is in possession of any portion of the property separately, the presumption referred to above is considerably weakened. No doubt it is true that the mere fact that a property is purchased in the name of a member of the family and that there are receipts in his name respecting it, does not render the property by itself, his separate property; but if in addition to the fact that certain property stands in the name of one of the members, there be these further facts, namely, that some other members of the family have properties standing in their separate names and are found to deal with the same as their own without reference to the rest of the family and that the members of the family are allowed to appear to the world to be the owners of the said separate properties, the presumption that the properties are joint is almost gone and the burden of proving that the properties are still joint will lie on those who allege that they are joint. If the family remains joint no charge can be made against any coparcener because in consequence of his having a larger family to maintain than others, a larger share of the joint income was spent on his family. Such expenditure is considered to be the legitimate expenditure of the whole family. If, however, the expenses of the marriages of the daughters and of the education of the children are paid for separately by the coparceners, that is a circumstance which must be taken into consideration for the purpose of finding out whether the family still remained joint", Abhoy Chandra v. Peyari Mohan, 5 B.L.R. 347.

It does not, however, follow from the above ruling that it is not open to the members of a Dayabhaga family to become divided except by dividing the family property by metes and bounds, and that, even though the intention to separate had been unequivocally declared and everything else necessary to bring about the disruption of the family had been done, the family would still be joint in law merely because, there was no division by metes and bounds. An unequivocal declaration of intention, however, is necessary in all cases to prove division, In re Mullick and Sons, 1938 I.T.R. 99 (All.). See, however, section 25-A as to the conditions to be satisfied before the Income-tax Officer can treat a family as divided for the purpose of taxation.

Gifts from father.—According to a long course of rulings on the Madras High Court, where a father gives his self acquired property to his son, he takes it as ancestral property unless it is apparent that the gift was intended to be personal to the son. This view however, is not shared by certain other High Courts. See Velayudhan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 30.

Assessment after partition.—See section 25-A and notes thereunder.

Partition—Questions of fact and law.—It will be seen from the foregoing that the law merely lays down various presumptions which, of course, can always be rebutted by stronger evidence to the contrary, e.g., the partition might be a mere use for hoodwinking creditors and in fact the family might continue to be joint. The essential thing to remember is that it is always primarily a question of fact whether a Hindu family is divided or not, Piyarelal, etc. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1933 I.T.R. 215; Raja Singh Obera v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1934 I.T.R. 331, and under the Income-tax Act it is entirely for the Income-tax authorities to decide questions of fact and not for the Civil Courts. So long, therefore, as the Income-tax authorities do not misunderstand the law or act without reasonable grounds, the High Court will not interfere with their conclusions.

If all the persons concerned agree that the family is divided, the Income-tax Officer must concede that at that point of time when they so agree the family is divided, O.L.K.K.N. Kannappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 381, unless the Income-tax Officer has evidence to show that the agreed partition is a sham.

Where arbitrators appointed by the members of a family delivered the award in November, 1935 (which was made a rule of the Court in February, 1936) and the award stated that the partition would take effect from 1921 (from which date in fact there had been a private partition) it was held that the Income-tax authorities acted rightly in giving effect to the partition from 1921, In re Ratanchand Lallumal, 1936 I.T.R. 189 (All.); A.I.R. 1936 All. 279.

Where a joint family had no nucleus, a mere admission at one stage that all income was joint could not be conclusive of that fact in the face of stronger evidence to the contrary that may be adduced in a later year to show that a particular block of income had not been joint at all. S. B. Indra Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1943 I.T.R. 16. In the absence of anything on the record to suggest a contrary conclusion, an Income-tax Officer is not justified in refusing to accept an affidavit by the assessee (that he had thrown into his family stock his self-acquired properties) merely on the ground that the affidavit, being a confidential document under section 54, could not be used against the assessee by any other person. In re Lakshminarain Gadodia, 1943 I.T.R. 491 (Lah.).

See also notes below under "Trading families."

Stridhanam.—A difficult matter in Hindu undivided families from the point of view of the Income-tax Officer is 'Stridhanam', i.e., property belonging to a female and subject to special laws. Under the Hindu law a woman, whether married or not, has absolute right over her own property in certain cases. Presents from parents or from the husband, and property, which she has acquired for herself out of the above kinds of property, are all her own absolute property and the family has no claim of any sort upon it. See as to the nature and incidents of Stridhana Mayne's Hindu Law, 10th Ed., Ch. XVI, pp. 740, et seq. If she gives a portion of her income to others, such payments are gifts pure and simple and should be treated as such by the Income-tax Officer. The right of inheritance in regard to Stridhanam is also peculiar. It is from mother to daughter. Under the Hindu law, a woman may also have a life estate in a property; but it makes no difference for the purpose of income-tax whether a person's interest is only a life interest or not, since what has to be taxed is only the income. A Hindu lady may have to maintain other members, in which case such maintenance expenses cannot be taxed again as the income of those maintained or deducted from her own income except in circumstances that would constitute a charge on the property. See Raja Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 4 I.T.C. 151, on appeal 60 I.A. 196; 6 I.T.C. 449; 60 Cal. 1029; 1933 I.T.R. 135.

By a special provision in the Income-tax Act, however, the income of a wife or of minor children whether of a Hindu or not is added on to the income of the husband or father in certain circumstances. See section 16.

Benami.—It is not uncommon, for Hindu undivided families—especially trading ones—to transfer benami, i.e., fictitiously, the property of the family to one of the female members but actually keeping it as the family property. Cases of this type involve difficult questions of fact, which however are entirely for the Income-tax Officer to decide on evidence, Haldar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 6 I.T.C. 37. There is no presumption that a property standing in the name of a Hindu female who is a member of a joint family belongs to the family and is not her Stridhanam. The burden of proof lies upon the person who asserts that the apparent is not the real state of things, Bluban Mohini Dasi v. Kumud Bala Dasi, 28 C.W.N. 131; Ramkinkar Banerjee v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1936 I.T.R. 108.

Maintenance charges and assignments.—An assessee governed by Mitakshara law had to pay under a decree of a Court a maintenance allowance to his step-mother, the allowance being a charge on his whole estate. The Calcutta High Court held that there was no provision under sections 8 et seq under which the allowance could be deducted. The Privy Council however decided that the allowance was not the assessee's income at all within the meaning of section 3 which seeks to charge only what reaches the assessee as income, Raja Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 60 I.A. 196; 1933 I.T.R. 135. A similar case was Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. D. R. Naik, 1939 I.T.R. 362 (see notes under section 3 on income from encumbered property). It must be noted, however, that, in calculating the taxable income of a Hindu joint family, maintenance and residence allowances paid to a widow of a coparcener cannot be deducted merely because the amounts of the allowances have been fixed by a Court. In the Dudhuria case, the Crown sought to tax the sole surviving member of a Hindu joint family as an individual; and in determining his income as an individual the allowance paid to a step-mother under a Court decree had to be deducted. Where the assessment is made on a family as such, such allowances cannot be deducted, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Makanji Lalji, 1937 I.T.R. 538; I.L.R. (1937) Bom. 827; A.I.R. 1937 Bom. 479.

An allowance, out of an assignment of land revenue by Government (jagir) made by the holder of the assignment (who has to be approved by Government) to a younger member of the family (the allowance being determined by Government) is not received by the younger member as a member of the family since the allowance is a gift of the Government and would not necessarily cease if the payee left the family and is not received out of the income of the family, Kanwar Kartar Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1937 I.T.R. 569; A.I.R. 1937 Lah. 905.

A Hindu (assessee) succeeded to an estate of which he was not the reversioner, under a will, which provided, inter alia, for a payment of Rs. 42,000 a year to the assessee's mother as a charge. The estate came under the Court of Wards who, by consent, gave Rs. 30,000 a year to the mother. The question arose whether or not the mother received the allowance as a member of a Hindu undivided family, and it was held that she did, because irrespective of the source from which the son acquired the property he was bound to maintain his mother. What she received was therefore as a member of the family and not under the will. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Rani Rudh Kumari, 1940 I.T.R. 607 (Oudh). Where a widow leaves the family and surrenders her life estate in it in return for a monthly allowance, the allowance is not received by her as a member of the family, of which she was no longer a member having left it. In re Kamalabala Dasi, 1940 I.T.R. 404 (Cal.).

Impartible estates.—The position of impartible estates has been one of difficulty as the following rulings will show.

Income from Royalties from land assigned by the holder of an impartible estate to his younger brothers on the following conditions: (a) The grant could be resumed on the death of the grantor by his successor or by the grantor on the death of the grantee; (b) The grantor reserved to himself the right to a certain part of the Royalties and required the grantee to refer to him re-settlements of land surrendered by tenants—was held to be the income of the impartible estate because the holder had not parted with the lands irrevocably. The test of such irrevocable parting is not, who can sue the tenants for rent or grant acquittances for rent, but whether the assignment represents a diversion by the owner of a part of his income in order to meet a liability of his or whether it represents a charge on the income at source, i.e., a prior claim before anything can accrue to him leaving him only the residual share, Raja Jyothi Prasad Singh Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 5 I.T.C. 68, following Hudson v. Gribble and Bell v. Gribble, 4 Tax Cases 522; (1903) 1 K.B.D. 517. On the other hand in Krishan Kishore v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1933 I.T.R. 143; 14 Lah. 255; A.I.R. 1933 Lah. 284, it was held that an allowance payable to a younger son in an impartible family was not part of the income of the family but of the nature of a charge on the estate, that it was the separate property of the younger son and should, therefore, be excluded from the income of the family, and taxed as the younger son's income. The question was again considered first by the Allahabad High Court in In re Maharaja Kumar of Vizianagaram, 1934 I.T.R. 186 and then by the Madras High Court in Narayana Gajapathi Razu v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1934 I.T.R. 288, both the Courts holding that the allowance due to and received by a junior member of an impartible Hindu family is received by him as a member of such family, and is therefore exempt both from super-tax and income-tax. The question is not, whose income the allowance is, but whether it is received by a member of a Hindu undivided family as such, i.e., in accordance with custom, and there having been no actual separation of the family. The Allahabad High Court distinguished Kishan Kishore's case on the ground that in that case the younger son had in fact become separate. Such separation in the case of an impartible family is indicated by a renunciation of the right to succession.

These decisions apply only to allowances claimable by the junior members and not to pure gifts by the senior member. It would appear from these decisions that such gifts should be included in the income of the family. See also section 14 and notes thereunder.

The Patna High Court held in Raja Shivaprasad Singh v. King Emperor, 1 I.T.C. 389, that the Finance Act contemplates the larger deduction for purposes of Super-tax only if the income is that of a joint family in which all the members are jointly interested and not in the case of an impartible estate in which the income is the property of the holder for the time being. If the estate is impartible the other members have no rights of coparcenership, and all that they have is a right of succession by survivorship. They cannot demand a partition or restrain alienation. The income of the estate is the income of the incumbent for the time being, and the fact that he is bound to maintain others (e.g., sons) does not make the income that of a joint family.

On the other hand, the Lahore High Court held in Diwan Krishan Kishore's case that the estate of an impartible Hindu family is not the sole property of the individual as the head of the family but the property of the family subject to all the incidents of impartibility and that super-tax should be charged accordingly.

After reviewing certain authorities, viz., Shivaprasad Singh v. Prayag-kumari Debi, 59 Cal. 1399 (P.C.); Jagadamba Kumari v. Wazir Narayan Singh, 2 Pat. 319 (P.C.); Parbati Kumari Debi v. Jagdischandrar Debal, 29 Cal. 433 (P.C.), which lay down that the income of an impartible estate is the absolute property of the holder and in no way different from property gained by his own effort or come to him in circumstances entirely dissociated from the ownership of the estate, the Madras High Court held that there was no reason why the income of a holder of an impartible Hindu estate from that estate should, for the purpose of taxation be treated differently from his income arising from his own personal exertions or other sources. All that Krishan Kishore's case decided was that there is no legal sanction for the proposition that an estate governed by primogeniture cannot belong to a Hindu undivided family but must be the sole property of the person who has succeeded by primogeniture, and it does not lay down that income from an impartible estate is joint family income, Raja of Bobbili v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1937 I.T.R. 78.

In Bisvesvar Singh's case, 1935 I.T.R. 216 (referred to under section 14) the only question raised was as to the nature of the income in the hands of the younger member who received the maintenance allowance and not as to the nature of the income in the hands of the holder of the estate; and in a later case, Rajendra Narayan Bhanja Deo v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1938 I.T.R. 536, the Patna High Court followed Raja Shivaprasad Singh v. King Emperor, 1 I.T.C. 389, and declined to follow the Lahore decision in Kishan Kishore's case, 1933 I.T.R. 143. The Lahore High Court reconsidered the decision in 1933 I.T.R. 143 in the light of several rulings of the Privy Council and decided to adhere to its decision, definitely dissenting from the Madras decision in the Bobbili case and the Patna decision in Rajendra Narayan's case. According to the Lahore view, the holder of an impartible Mitakshara estate regulated by primogeniture, is taxable as the head of a family and not as individual. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab v. Diwan Krishan Kishore, 1939 I.T.R. 427. This decision was modified by the Privy Council on appeal. The income was to be taxed, not as that of the family but as that of the head thereof except that income from property under section 9 should be taxed on the family since the family and not the head thereof individually was the owner of the property (see section 9). Though the co-ownership of the junior members may be in a sense only, carrying no present right to joint possession, if the question be whether the Hindu undivided family or the present holder is the owner of the estate, the answer in Hindu law is it is joint family property. There is a distinction between the ownership of the property which is joint and that of the income which is not. The income of the head of the family other than under section 9 can be added on to his income from outside the family. The question was left open whether though the house property belonged to the family, the head could be charged individually under section 12 because in fact he received the income from the property.

Where a holder of an impartible estate had to pay allowances to the Ranis of his predecessor under the orders of a Court arising out of litigation in which the Ranis had challenged the successor's membership of the joint family of the predecessor, and such allowances were a charge on the estate, the Income-tax Department refused to deduct the allowances from the taxable income of the holder of the estate on the ground that the allowances were paid to members of a Hindu undivided family from its income. This view was not accepted by the High Court. Shivprasad Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1942 I.T.R. 349, following Raja Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1933 I.T.R. 135 (P.C.).

The payment, by the Court of Wards, as manager of an impartible Mitakshara estate, of a maintenance allowance to the mother of the holder thereof was held to be received by the mother as a member of the family. An impartible estate belongs to the family, though the holder for the time being may have absolute rights over its income. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O. v. Maharani Gyan Manjari Kauri, 1945 I.T.R. 55. An allowance paid under the Oudh Estates Act out of the income of an impartible estate is not received qua a member of a Hindu undivided family, because the Act is not restricted to Hindus only. Rani Ananda Kumari v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., 1943 I.T.R. 235 (Oudh). The Oudh Estates Act covers both Hindu and Muslim estates, and created or re-created as the case may be, certain estates and gave them legal form. Such an estate, therefore, does not have all the incidents of a Hindu impartible estate, and an allowance for maintenance received by a younger member is not received by him qua a member of a Hindu undivided family. Rananajaya Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., 1944 I.T.R. 159 (Oudh).

Trading families.—The most important class of Hindu undivided family from the standpoint of the Income-tax Officer is, undoubtedly, the joint Hindu family firm. The law regarding these families is slightly different from that regarding non-trading families. If the family carries on an ancestral trade or with the consent of all its members a new trade, it is governed not by the ordinary Hindu law, but by such law as modified by the exigencies and usages of the trade. The business is not dissolved by the death of any of the members. No member can, even when severing his connection with the family, demand accounts of profits and losses. Any member, not necessarily the senior male member, can be the manager of the business and as such can pledge the credit and assets of the family without being accountable for losses or gains. But a partnership based on only some of the members of the family, whether with outsiders or among themselves, is not a business of the family. Even if a business is carried on by all the members of the family, if the profits are divided upon some agreed proportion, the trade is not that of the family but that of an ordinary firm under the ordinary law of partnership.

Section 5 of the Indian Partnership Act lays down that the relation of partnership arises from contract and not from status and in particular that the members of a Hindu undivided family carrying on the family business as such, or a Burmese Buddhist husband and wife carrying on business as such are not partners in such business.

A Hindu undivided family, originally joint in mess and worship, carried on an ancestral business. There was no capital account in the name of the family as a whole but separate capital accounts as well as personal accounts in the names of the individual members. The profits were not distributed equally between the members but in the ratio of 5 to 3. The profits were enjoyed by each person separately. Held, that the persons constituted an unregistered firm and not a Hindu undivided family for the purpose of assessment to income-tax, Harisingh Santokchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 80.

Whether a business carried on by a member of a Hindu undivided family in partnership with outsiders is the family business or not is a question of fact. In a case in which (1) the business with strangers was started when the member was an infant, (2) he had no property at any time apart from his share in the family property, and (3) he was still a student and conducted no business of his own, the High Court considered that there was evidence for the Income-tax Officer's finding that the business belonged to the family, Devkinandan & Sons v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Delhi, 4 I.T.C. 398; A.I.R. 1930 Lah. 605. There is no presumption that a business carried on by a member, even the karta of a Hindu undivided family, or by such member in partnership with an outsider belongs to the family. It is all a question of fact. Jitmal Chamanlall v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1944 I.T.R. 296.

There is no conclusive presumption that a business belongs to a joint family merely because it is carried on by father and son together. Sardar Sahèb Sardar Singar Singh and Sons v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1942 I.T.R. 441.

A mere agreement to the effect that certain businesses belong to particular members of the family, the others having no interest in them or in the assets and liabilities thereof does not result in the disruption of the family in the absence of any disclosure in the agreement of an intention on the part of members of the family to separate, In re, Chokeylal Murlidar (All.), 4 I.T.C. 7. A mere statement before the Income-tax authorities that self-acquired income has been thrown into the common stock is not conclusive. Income from self-acquired property not put into the common stock is taxable as on an individual, In re Moolji Sikka, etc., 1935 I.T.R. 123 (Cal.). Where a part at least of the trading funds was admittedly joint property and the individuals could not point to the separate funds out of which the business was alleged to have grown it was held that the business belonged to the family, In re Bhajan Lal Samuldas (All.), 5 I.T.C. 118. A mere recital in a will that certain businesses not disposed of by the will had already been partitioned is at best a piece of evidence as to such partition and not conclusive as to such a fact, Mathradas v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1933 I.T.R. 212; A.I.R. 1933 Lah. 815.

The mere execution of a formal partnership-deed is not conclusive as establishing the break-up of a Hindu undivided family if there is other evidence to the contrary, Ghanshyamdas Ramkumar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 6 I.T.C. 198. Though the recitals in a partnership deed may be conclusive evidence as between the partners, the Income-tax Officer is not bound by them, and can call for corroborative evidence. Therefore, when there is no evidence beyond such recitals to prove the disruption of a family, it is open to the Income-tax Officer to hold that the family continues to be joint. Persons cannot at one and the same point of time be a joint family in respect of family property and be also a partnership of which such property forms the assets, In re Mullick and Sons, 1938 I.T.R. 99. Where a managing member of a joint family enters into a partnership with a stranger, the other members of the family do not ipso facto become partners of the business so as to clothe them into all the rights and obligations of a partner as defined in the Indian Contract (Partnership) Act. In such a case, the family as a unit does not become a partner but only such of its members as in fact enter into contractual relation with the stranger; the partnership will be governed by the Act. Mayne's Hindu Law (9th Edn., p. 398) quoted with approval by the Privy Council in P. K. P. S. Pichappa Chettiar v. Chockalingam Pillai, 67 M.L.J. 366; 150 I.C. 802.

There can be no partnership in law between the karta as an individual and the karta as karta, Lokenath Dandhania v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1940 I.T.R. 369.

See also rulings referred to in the notes under sub-section (6-B) giving the definition of 'firm'.

Effect of registration on joint family firm.—The registration of some members of a Hindu undivided family as a firm under section 2 (16) precludes the assessment of the Hindu undivided family as such to super-tax on the income derived from the business of the firm unless the firm so registered has been shown to carry on its business on behalf of and for the benefit of the family. But the mere constitution of a partnership between some members of the family by a formal document does not preclude the assessment of the income of the partnership to super-tax as part of the income of the family if the partnership is conducted on behalf of and for the benefit of the family, Chief Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Doraiswami Aiyangar and Brothers, 1 I.T.C. 214; 46 Mad. 673.

History.—Under the 1886 Act, 'any income which a person enjoys as a member of a Hindu undivided family when the family is liable to tax' was exempt, the share of the income of the individual member was ignored in assessing him—both as to liability and as to rate. Under the Act of 1918, however, while the family as such was treated as a separate assessee, the amount which an individual member received from the family was taken into account in determining the rate at which he should pay income-tax on his other income. This arrangement, however, was abandoned in 1922. Before 1922 no rebate of income-tax was allowed to a Hindu undivided family on account of premia of Life Assurance Policies on the life of the members, but under the present Act such rebates are allowed to the extent of one-sixth of the total income of the family or twelve thousand rupees whichever is less in respect of insurance on the life of any male member of the family or of the wife of any such member.

(10) "Prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under this Act:

'Prescribed'.—See section 59 as to who can make rules and under what conditions. The rules have been set out in one place together after the bare text of the Act, and references have been given in the notes under each section to the rules connected with that section.

Till 1930, all the rules were made by the Central Board of Revenue. From that year some of the rules under Chapter IX-A (relief to certain classes of provident funds) are made by the Governor-General in Council.

(11) "Previous year" means in respect of any separate source of income, profits and gains:—

(a) the twelve months ending on the 31st day of March next preceding the year for which the assessment is to be made, or, if the accounts of the assessee have been made up to a date within the said twelve months in respect of a year ending on any date other than the said 31st day of March, then at the option of the assessee the year ending on the day to which his accounts have so been made up:

Provided that where an assessee has once been assessed in respect of a particular source of income, profits and gains, he shall not in respect of that source exercise this option so as to vary the meaning of the expression 'previous year' as then applicable to him except with the consent of the Income-tax Officer and upon such conditions as the Income-tax Officer may think fit; or

(b) in the case of any person, business or company or class of person, business or company, such period as may be determined by the Central Board of Revenue or by such authority as the Board may authorise in this behalf; or

(c) where a business, profession or vocation has been newly set up in the financial year preceding the year for which the assessment is to be made, the period from the date of the setting up of the business, profession or vocation to the 31st day of March next following or to the last day of the period determined under sub-clause (b), or, if the accounts of the assessee are made up to some other date than the 31st day of March, and the case is not one for which a period has been determined by the Central Board of Revenue under sub-clause (b), then, at the option of the assessee, the period from the date of the setting up of the business, profession or vocation to such other date:

Provided that when such other date does not fall between the setting up of the business, profession or vocation and the next following 31st day of March, it shall be deemed that there is no previous year; and

means the previous year as determined for the assessment of the income, profits and gains of the firm;

History.—There was no definition of 'previous year' in the Act of 1886, but section 11 of that Act provided a similar definition [like clause (a)], in respect of Joint Stock Companies and in respect of "other sources of income". The definition in the 1918 Act was the same as clause (a) of the present definition. Clause (b) was introduced in order to cover exceptional cases in which a commercial community (1) follows a year which is slightly over or under 12 months and (2) follows year which ends a few days or weeks after the financial year.

The following changes were made in 1939: (1) The words "in respect of any separate source of income, profits and gains" were inserted:

(2) The Proviso under (a) was substituted for the following:—

Provided that, if this option has once been exercised by the assessee, it shall not again be exercised so as to vary the meaning of the expression "previous year" as then applicable to such assessee except with the consent of the Income-tax Officer and upon such conditions as he may think fit;

Item (2) is partly consequential on Item (1) and partly in order to avoid double assessment in certain cases as explained later in these notes.

(3) Clause (c) was added in order to avoid double assessment of a part of profits of new businesses, etc., and (4) the 'previous year' of a partner in a firm was made clear.

Object of proviso in clause (a).—The discretion of the Income-tax Officer is absolute, and it is open to him to impose any conditions that he may think fit in order to safeguard the revenue. So long as his action is not mala fide or perverse or inherently unjust, the intervention of the Court cannot be invoked. The Income-tax Manual says:—

"The Income-tax Officer will not permit the assessee to exercise the option if that proviso applies, unless he is satisfied that the change of 'previous year' in respect of any sum of income, profits and gains is sought on substantial grounds other than that of avoidance of tax. When the Income-tax Officer does give his consent under the proviso, the full period from the end of the 'previous year' for the preceding year's assessment to the end of the new accounting date will be taken as the 'previous year', whether such period is greater or less than a year. In no circumstances, however, will the rate of tax be adjusted so as to apply a rate to an income of a period greater or less than twelve months which would have been applied had the 'previous year' been exactly twelve months. On this matter the instructions given to Income-tax Officer under the Act before amendment (in 1939) have been withdrawn."

As regards the changes made in 1939 at the beginning of the definition and in the proviso to clause (a), see the following extract from the Enquiry Committee's report:—

"(a) The practice, where the assessee has more than one source of income and closes his accounts therefor at different dates is, to calculate the income from each separate source (separate businesses are intended to be treated as separate sources) according to the separate accounting year adopted for it. This practice has been recently disapproved by the Bombay High Court in the case of Commissioner of Income-tax v. Abu Baker Abdul Rehman, 1936 I.T.R. 232, and we suggest that it be reaffirmed by amendment of clause (11) of section

2 of the Act, by the addition after the words " 'Previous year' means" of words such as "for each separate source of income".

(b) It has been represented to us that when an assessee exercises the option under section 2 (11) (a) for the first time after his first year of assessment, this involves double assessment of part of his profits in the normal case. To remedy this, we suggest that the proviso to that sub-section be amended as follows:—"Provided that where an assessee has been previously assessed in respect of the same source of income, he shall not exercise this option so as to vary the meaning of the expression 'previous year' as then applicable to him except with the consent of the Income-tax Officer, and upon such conditions as he may think fit." This amendment would enable the Income-tax Officer to prevent double assessment in all cases of change of accounting date on the lines suggested in paragraph 6 (iv) of the Manual."

Any separate source.—Though it can be argued that 'source' means one of the heads referred to in section 6 which uses the words "other sources" in the residuary head, the word would appear to be used in its ordinary meaning of something from which income arises, i.e., in the sense contemplated by the Enquiry Committee. Possibly each branch of a business would also be a separate source for this purpose. With reference to the words "income received from a source within" an area, the Privy Council quoted with approval the opinion that "source means not a legal concept, but something which a practical man would regard as a real source of income." Rhodesia Metals Co. v. Commissioner of Taxes, 1941 I.T.R. (Sup.) 45.

Clause (b)—Delegation under.—The Central Board of Revenue has authorised Commissioners of Income-tax to recognise as the 'previous year' any commercial year, in usage, which is not less than 11 calendar months nor more than 13 months and also a year which does not terminate later than 30th April. The Central Board of Revenue can authorise any period as 'the previous year', Nanakchand Fatechand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 167; 7 Lah. 223; A.I.R. 1926 Lah. 421.

Neither the Commissioners nor the Central Board of Revenue can refuse without adequate grounds to exercise this discretion—see Julius v. Oxford, (1880) 5 App. Cas. 214, and other cases cited in the Introduction.

In the absence of orders by the Commissioner of Income-tax or Central Board of Revenue, the Income-tax Officer is bound by clause (a) of the definition, i.e., must adhere to a year of 12 calendar months terminating on some day in the previous financial year.

New business.—As regards the object of the earlier part of clause (c), see the following extract from the Enquiry Report.

"A difficulty arises in the case of a newly set-up business, the accounts of which are made up to a date other than 31st March. Clause (11) (a) of section 2 of the Act provides that the "previous year" shall be the 12 months ending on the 31st March preceding the year for which the assessment is to be made, or, at the option of the assessee, the year ending on some other date within the said 12 months, if accounts were made up for a period of a year on that date, and does not provide specifically for the case of a new business.

In some circles, it appears to be the practice in the case of a new business to take such proportion of the profits shown by the first account as corresponds to the period from the date of the setting up of the business to the following 31st March for the purpose of the first assessment of the business, again taking a full 12 months' proportion of the profits shown by that account for the second assessment. This may involve the assessment twice of the same profits. For example, a business is commenced on 1st January, 1935, and the profits for its year's trading to 31st December, 1935 amount to Rs. 10,000. There would be an assessment for the 3 months to 31st March, 1935 of Rs. 2,500 and an assessment for the 12 months to 31st December, 1935 of Rs. 10,000—a double assessment of Rs. 2,500 for which no relief is provided."

This clause makes a part of the decision in Nanakchand Fatechand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 167; 7 Lah. 223 obsolete.

Two years' accounts in one year.—An assessee need not necessarily adopt a method which avoids two 31st March-es falling within an accounting year; for example that Samvat year, often adopted, varies in length and may have two 31st March-es within it. But he cannot incorporate two years' results in one year. Where the head office accounts, for example, are by the Samvat year (starting on 19th March) covering more than 365 days and the branches close every year on 31st March he cannot accumulate the results of the main office, Melamal Shiv Dayal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1937 I.T.R. 329. He can take into account only one year's results of each source or business.

Life Insurance Company.—It was conceded by the Crown in In re North British and Mercantile Insurance, Co., Ltd., 1937 I.T.R. 439 (Cal.) that the previous year in such cases meant the twelve months ending with the last day of the accounting year preceding the beginning of the year of charge. As to the position from 1st April, 1939, see section 10 (7) and schedule to the Act.

Temporary change in accounting period.—If an assessee alters his accounting period even temporarily, the consent of the Income-tax Officer is necessary.

Partners in firms.—A partner can have a 'previous year' for his other income different from that of the firm of which he is a partner; so far as his share of profits in the firm is concerned, he must adopt the same 'previous year' as the firm. Consequently the different parts of his income in a given twelve months from different sources may be liable to assessment in different financial years.

Succession.—Where there is a succession under section 26 the successor is clearly entitled to exercise the option allowed by clause (a) once, and it is presumably not open to the Crown to contend that the successor takes over all the rights and liabilities of the predecessor. In this connection, see notes under section 26.

Firm—Change in constitution of.—Under section 2 (2) an assessee means a person by whom income-tax is payable, and sections 3 and 55 contemplate firms being assesseees. The question therefore arises whether when there is a change in the constitution of a partnership, the partnership as newly constituted is a new assessee. A mere change in the constitution of a partnership will not in itself make the new partnership a separate assessee from the old partnership. It would depend on the facts of each case whether a change in constitution involves the dissolution of partnership and the formation of another or not.

(12) "Principal officer," used with reference to a local authority or a company or any other public body or any association means—

(a) the secretary, treasurer, manager or agent of the authority, company, body or association, or

(b) any person connected with the authority, company, body or association upon whom the Income-tax Officer has served a notice of his intention of treating him as the principal officer thereof;

History.—This definition has been practically the same since 1886.

The word 'any' after 'public body or' was inserted by the Income-tax Amendment Act (XI of 1924). Otherwise the adjective 'public' would qualify 'association'.

Practice.—The Income-tax Manual formerly contained the following instructions: "Income-tax Officers should treat as the principal officer, in the first instance, the officials specified in clause (a); it is only in cases where the Income-tax Officer has no information regarding the persons who discharge the functions of the officers mentioned in clause (a) or where such persons cannot be found that he should use the powers conferred by clause (b) of treating as the principal officer any other person connected with the company, etc." They have been withdrawn, presumably as being superfluous.

'Local authority'.—For definition, see notes under section 1.

'Connected with' is vague and might include almost anybody. If the question of imposing any penalty on the person arose, a Court would probably whittle down the meaning of the words "connected with" so as to cover only responsible officers of the company.

Manager.—The word would include the liquidator of a company, In re Agra Spinning & Weaving Mills, Ltd., 1934 I.T.R. 79.

Notice.—No form has been prescribed for this notice, but the service of a notice is obligatory in cases falling under clause (b).

Objections.—Though, there is no express provision, as, for example, in section 43, giving the person served with notice an opportunity of being heard by the Income-tax Officer, it is evidently incumbent on the latter to hear the objections of the person, if the latter has any, before deciding finally to treat him as 'principal officer'.

(13) "Public servant" has the same meaning as in the Indian Penal Code;

Public Servant.—This definition was introduced in 1922 in order to make it clear that the expression includes all income-tax employees and is not restricted to the particular authorities mentioned in section 5. The words "public servant" according to the Indian Penal Code denote a person falling under any of the descriptions hereinafter following, namely:—

"Ninth.—Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property on behalf of Government, to make any survey, assessment or contract on behalf of Government, or to execute any revenue-process, or to investigate, or to report on any matter affecting the pecuniary interest of Government, or to make, authenticate or keep any document relating to the pecuniary interests of Government, or to prevent the infraction of any law for the protection of the pecuniary interests of Government, and every officer in the service or pay of Government or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty;

Tenth.—Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property, to make any survey or assessment, or to levy any rate or tax for any secular common purpose of any village, town or district, or to make, authenticate or keep any document for the ascertaining of the rights of the people of any village, town or district.

Explanation 1.—Persons falling under any of the above descriptions are public servants, whether appointed by the Government or not.

Explanation 2.—Wherever the words ‘public servant’ occur, they shall be understood of every person who is in actual possession of the situation of a public servant, whatever legal defect there may be in his right to hold that situation.”

(14) “Registered firm” means a firm registered under the provisions of section 26-A;

History.—The present definition dates from April, 1930 (Act XXI of 1930); and the corresponding earlier provisions are of little interest now. The reason originally for not treating all firms as if they were registered was that, as pointed out by the Joint Committee of 1922, taxation at the maximum rate and subsequent refund would inflict hardship on the smaller assesses even though they might eventually have to suffer less tax, but this argument is no longer valid since, under the Amending Act of 1939, the profits of registered firms are now directly assessable in the hands of the partners and the firm as such is not ordinarily taxed; formerly, a registered firm was taxable at the maximum rate and the partners were eligible for a refund, though, in practice, registered firms and the partners were assessed simultaneously and the assessment of the firm was purely formal. See also section 23 (5) (a). The option to register, being one-sided, furnishes an incentive to persons to evade tax, and a check has been provided against such evasion by section 23 (5) which gives discretion to the Income-tax Officer to tax an unregistered firm as if it were registered if in his opinion the aggregate tax payable by the partners on the latter assumption would be greater.

Registered firm—How taxed—Comparison with unregistered firm.—The position of a registered firm at present is as below: First as regards income-tax. No tax is payable by the firm as such except in respect of the shares of non-resident partners; and the shares of profits of resident partners are assessed directly on them [section 23 (5) (a)]. An unregistered firm, on the other hand, is assessed like an individual, i.e., depending on the income of the firm. The partners are not entitled to refunds, nor are they taxed on the profits from the firm unless the firm is not taxed; but their shares in the profits of the unregistered firm are taken into account in their ‘total income’ for fixing the rate at which they should pay tax on their income [section 16 (1)]. See notes thereunder.

If an unregistered firm as such pays no tax, e.g., on the ground that its income is below the taxable limit, the partners are liable to pay tax on their respective shares along with the tax on their other income [section 14 (2) (b)]. See notes thereunder.

Next as regards super-tax. A registered firm as such is not liable to super-tax. The share of each partner in the firm's income is added on to his other income, and he is then individually assessed to super-tax. An unregistered firm, on the other hand, is taxed just like an individual; and super-tax is not payable on the shares of the profits received by partners, unless the firm was not assessed to super-tax (proviso to section 55).

Set-off—Partners—Income of.—As regards the set-off of profits against losses of partners in firms—whether registered or unregistered—see section 24 and notes thereunder.

Registered firms—Advantages of.—The partners are ordinarily not only better off than those in unregistered firms, but also better off than the shareholders in a company. In the latter, while shareholders are entitled to refunds in respect of income-tax paid by the company it was held under the pre-1939 law that the super-tax paid by the company was not paid on behalf of the shareholder and that the latter was not therefore entitled to a refund, Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1 I.T.C. 303. This has been made clear by the amendments to sections 18 (5) and 58 in 1939.

English Law.—In England no distinction is made between registered and unregistered firms. Otherwise the law is in its essential features, the same, and partnerships are treated very much like registered firms in India; but the details of procedure differ, e.g., as to which partner is liable to make a return, etc. No partnership is liable to super-tax in England, that tax being levied on individuals only. See sections 4, 14 (3) (c) and 20 and Rule 10, Cases I and II of Schedule D of the English Income-tax Act of 1918.

Rules.—As regards the rules regulating the procedure in connection with registration, see section 26-A and rules thereunder.

Cancellation of registration.—See section 23 (4) and Rule 6-B regarding the power of the Income-tax Officer to cancel the registration of a firm.

(15) "Total income" means total amount of income, profits and gains referred to in sub-section (1) of section 4 computed in the manner laid down in this Act; and 'total world income' includes all income, profits and gains wherever accruing or arising except income to which, under the provisions of sub-section (3) of section 4, this Act does not apply;

History.—There was no definition of 'total income' in the Act of 1886. A definition was first introduced in 1918, and was modified in 1922 to read as below: "means total amount of income, profits and gains from all sources to which this Act applies computed in the manner laid down in section 16". This definition was altered to its present form in 1939.

Total income.—The first part of the new definition is merely a drafting improvement on the old one and contemplates no change of substance.

Total World income.—There was a corresponding definition in section 48 (4) for regulating refunds to certain classes of non-residents.

In view, however, of the radical change in section 4 which makes 'residence' one of the conditions of liability in certain cases, this definition has been made more general and inserted at this place.

This definition is of importance in regulating the rate of tax on non-resident non-aliens on their British Indian income. See section 17.

The sum of Rs. 4,500 referred to in the third proviso to section 4 (1) (c) is not to be deducted from total world 'income', though it may not be taxed under that proviso.

Total income—Significance of.—The expression 'total income' occurs in sections 3, 4, 15 (3), 16, 17, 22, 23, 24-A, 24-B, 25-A, 30, 55, 56, 58-G, 58-H and 58-J. 'Total income' determines the rate or rates of tax applicable to successive slices of income though certain parts thereof may be exempt on one ground or another, e.g., interest from tax-free securities (section 8) or premia paid for insurance, etc. (section 15)—both exempt from income-tax on certain conditions—or share of a partner's profits in an unregistered firm [section 14 (2) and proviso to section 55]—exempt from both super-tax and income-tax if the firm has been taxed. The income received as a member of a Hindu joint family is neither taxed again nor included in the member's own total income, if any. Income from dividends is included in the shareholder's total income but credit is given for the tax paid by the company.

Income.—Before an item can be included in 'total income' it must be 'income, profits and gains', i.e., of the nature of 'income'. See notes under sections 2 (6-C) and 3.

Special definitions.—Note that 'total income' has been defined differently in the Finance Act—see notes thereunder.

(16) "Unregistered firm" means a firm which is not a registered firm.

See notes under registered firm—section 2 (14), where the difference between a registered and an unregistered firm has been brought out.

CHAPTER I.

CHARGE OF INCOME-TAX.

3. Where any Act of the Central Legislature enacts that income-tax shall be charged for any year at any rate or rates tax at that rate or those rates shall be charged for that year in accordance with, and subject to the provisions of, this Act in respect of the total income of the previous year of every individual, Hindu undivided family, company, and local authority, and of every firm and other association of persons or the partners of the firm or members of the association individually.

Charge of income-tax.

History.—This section dates from 1922 when it was decided to make the Income-tax Act a mere Act of machinery and procedure, leaving the actual charge of tax to be made by the Annual Finance Acts.

The words "and other association of individuals" were inserted by the Amendment Act XI of 1924. The word 'Central' was substituted for 'Indian' by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. The following changes were made in 1939; the words 'applicable to the total income of an assessee' after the word 'rates' occurring for the first time were omitted; for the words 'all income, profits and gains' the words 'the total income' were substituted, and for the words 'company, firm and other association of individuals' the words 'company and local authority, and of every firm and other association of persons or the partners of the firm or members of the association individually' were substituted.

Finance Act—Effect of.—Before section 67-B was added to the Income-tax Act, and in the absence of any general Act authorising the provisional collection of income-tax, etc., as in the case of Customs and Excise Duties, difficulty arose about the collection of such tax when there was delay in the passing of the Finance Act. S. 67-B has now removed this difficulty. The Finance Act levies tax each year, "for that year."

The Income-tax Act has no operative effect except so far as it is rendered applicable for the recovery of tax imposed for a particular fiscal year by a Finance Act. Consequently the provisions of the Income-tax Act applicable to a given case include the amendments incorporated therein before the Finance Act is passed. Maharajah of Pithapuram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 221 (P.C.).

Slab system.—The adoption of the slab system which results in successive slices of income bearing different rates of tax rendered the words 'applicable to the total income of the assessee' inappropriate.

Total income.—The substitution of this expression for 'all income, profits and gains' is merely to bring it in conformity with the revised structure of section 4 and the revised definition in section 2 (15). There is no change of substance.

Previous year.—See section 2 (11). As to each year being self-contained, see sections 10, 13 and 24 and notes thereunder.

Association of persons.—The reference to 'persons' instead of 'individuals' used prior to 1939 is to make clear beyond doubt the liability to tax of Chambers of Commerce and the like which are not associations of individuals but associations of associations. See, for example, the definition in section 58-A.

Firms or partners (and associations or members).—The object of the reference alternatively to the above classes of assessee is to make it clear that in some cases firms will be assessed and in others partners and that both the firm and the partners (or the association and the members) will not be taxed on the same income. See section 23 (5) and also sections 14 and 55.

Scheduled Districts.—The Act applies to such districts under section 1, and a notification under section 3 is not necessary in order to extend the Act to such areas, Sobhagmal Neemchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 7 I.T.C. 100. Unless the Finance Act has been applied to an excluded area under section 92 (1) of the Government of India Act, 1935, no tax can be levied even though the Income-tax Act may apply to that area. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O. v. Abdul Rauf, 1944 I.T.R. 76. See however section 67-B of the Income-tax Act.

Meaning of words.—All that the word 'charged' means is that the tax 'is payable' or that the assessee is commanded to pay the tax—see Direct Spanish Telegraph Co. v. Shepherd, 13 Q.B.D. 202 and Kensington Income- tax Commissioners v. Aramayo, (1916) 1 A.C. 215. The United Kingdom law, however, uses, generally speaking, a more unsatisfactory terminology in this respect than the Indian law and words like 'assess', 'charge' are used in varying senses; and the English decisions are therefore not of much help.

As regards the meaning of the words 'Hindu undivided family', 'company', 'firm', see section 2 and the notes thereunder. In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Trustees of Sir Currimbhai Ebrahim Baronetcy, A.I.R. 1932 Bom. 106, it was held by the Bombay High Court that the Corporation constituted by the Baronetcy Act was an individual and not an association of individuals.

As regards the question whether a foreign State can fall under any of these categories of persons mentioned here, see Introduction.

For the definition of 'total income', see sections 2 (15) and 16; for that of 'previous year', see section 2 (11). See, however, sections 24-A, 25, 25-A, and 26 regarding cases in which assessment is made on a basis other than that of the 'previous year'. 'In respect of' means really 'on'. See per the Master of Rolls in Kennard Davis v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 Tax Cases 341; (1923) 1 K.B. 370.

Deemed to be income.—See sections 2 (6-A) and (6-C) (definitions of 'dividend' and 'income') and sections 10 (2) (vii) and (xi) (excess sale proceeds of discarded plant and machinery) and (excess collection of bad debts written off), section 16 (inclusion of items taxed at source or of income of other persons), section 18 (5) (Tax collected at source), section 23-A (undistributed profits of certain companies), section 41 (income of beneficiaries), section 44-D et seq (income from assets transferred abroad and from certain kinds of sales and purchases of securities) 58-E (annual accretion in recognised provident funds), 58-J (3) (non-exempt part of transferred balances in the above funds) and section 58-S (returned contributions in superannuation funds). See also notes under section 4 as regards "constructive remittances" and under section 13 as regards method of accounting.

See also sections 4 (1) and (2), 7 (2), and 42, as to income deemed to accrue, arise or be received in British India.

Computation of income.—The tax is on total income, i.e., "income, profit and gains", see section 2 (15), and not on gross receipts. With this end in view, the sections which deal with each of the different heads of income (see sections 6 to 13) contain specific provisions regarding the permissible deductions and allowances and the taxable balance, Raja Prabhat Chandra Barua v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Assam, 5 I.T.C. 1; 57 I.A. 228; A.I.R. 1930 P.C. 209 (P.C.).

Section 3 is 'subject to the provisions' of the Act, and therefore to section 4 and section 23 (5); consequently, it is not open to a partner of a registered firm to claim that the free allowance of Rs. 4,500 of the remitted foreign income under section 4 (1) belonging to his firm should be given at Rs. 4,500 to each of the partners instead of to the firm as a whole. See also notes under sections 4 (1) and 23 (5). Mohanlal Hiralal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C. P., 1943 I.T.R. 259.

HOW EACH CLASS OF ASSESSEES IS TAXED.

Hindu undivided family.—As to how a Hindu undivided family is taxed, see notes under section 2 (9), section 14 and the schedules to the Finance Act.

Company.—As to how a company and its shareholders are taxed, see sections 2 (6), 16, 18 (5), 48, 49-B, 49-C and the schedule to the Finance Act.

See also section 23-A and notes under it.

Firm.—As regards the taxation of firms, see sections 2 (14) and (16), 14, 16, 23 (4) and (5), 26-A, 48 and 55 and notes thereunder.

Discontinuance of business, etc.—See section 25 and notes.

Succession or change in constitution.—See section 26 and notes.

Association of persons.—Not being a company or firm or a Hindu undivided family or a local authority. Specific reference has been made in the Act to such associations in various sections in the Act, e.g., sections 3, 55, 2 (12), 14, 63 (2) and 56. Chambers of Commerce, Clubs, Co-operative Societies, Buying and Selling pools and associations for profit which are not partnerships all fall under this class. Chambers of Commerce, for example are associations of associations and not associations of individuals; hence the use of the words “association of persons” and not of “associations of individuals”. Associations cannot be taxed on profits made from among the members themselves (see notes on Mutual concerns, infra) but they can be taxed in respect of profits made from outsiders, and in certain circumstances, if incorporated, profits made from shareholders also. Trustees of Provident Funds are obviously associations of persons.

From the grouping of classes of assessee in section 3, it can be argued that the expression “association of persons” should be construed ejusdem generis with the previous words in that section, the common generic qualities being presumably (1) joint interests and (2) the right to sue and the liability to be sued as an association. The definition of ‘principal officer’ in section 2 (12) and the procedure laid down in section 63 regarding the service of notices may also be taken to give some clue as to the nature of the associations contemplated by the Act. The Madras High Court however in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Saldanha, 55 M. 891, rejected the contention that the associations of individuals (now persons) contemplated by the Act were institutions like unincorporated companies. On the other hand, in the case of the Currimbhai Ebrahim Baronetcy Trust, 5 I.T.C. 484; 58 Bom. 317; 2 I.T.R. 148, the Bombay High Court held that the Corporation brought into existence by the Baronetcy Act was an individual and not an association. The words “association of individuals” should according to the Calcutta High Court be construed in their ordinary plain meaning. ‘Associate’ means, according to the Oxford Dictionary, “to join in common purpose or to join in an action;” and if persons join together, and remain so joined, for the purpose of buying and holding properties, they constitute an “association of individuals”, In re Elias and others, 1935 I.T.R. 408 (Cal.). The Allahabad High Court, however, have preferred to construe the words ejusdem generis with the immediately preceding words, i.e., the association must have some at least of the attributes of a firm or partnership, though not in the strictly legal sense of the term. Persons, therefore, with undivided, though specified, shares in an income producing asset cannot be taxed as an association even if they appoint a common agent to collect the income. It might be a different question, however, if they had a common scheme of management and an agent for this purpose, Muhammad Aslam v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., A.I.R. 1936 All. 817. The Court attached some importance also to the absence of a comma, after the word ‘firm’ and to the transposition of “Hindu undivided family” to a higher place in the section as it then stood.

In a later case In re Keshardeo Chamria, (1937) I.T.R. 246, the Calcutta High Court construed the words ejusdem generis with reference to the word 'firm' and held that they did not cover the case of members of a Mitakshara Hindu undivided family after a preliminary decree for partition has been made before actual partition. But the Bombay High Court has followed In re Elias and others, (1935) I.T.R. 408 (Cal.) and dissented from Muhammad Aslam v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., (1936) I.T.R. 412, that is, has construed the words in their plain and ordinary meaning and not ejusdem generis, the only limit imposed on the words being that the association should be one producing income, profits or gains, since there is very little in common between a Hindu undivided family, a company and a firm, and it is, therefore, difficult, if not impossible to find a fourth class of association having the common feature with these three, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Laxmidas Devidas and others, (1937) I.T.R. 584; Commissioner of Income-tax v. Dwarkanath Harishchandra, (1937) I.T.R. 716. In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Bapooria and others, (1939) I.T.R. 225, the Rangoon High Court was inclined to construe the words ejusdem generis not only with 'firm' but with all the other groups.

Seven separated members of a partitioned Hindu family jointly purchased a plot of land and built a house on it which was managed jointly, the income being alleged to be divided between the seven members but without any accounts to support the statement. It was held that the seven members constituted an association of individuals. Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind v. Chotalal Mohanlal, 1940 I.T.R. 114. Coheirs of a deceased Muslim, inheriting specific shares of property and managing it jointly through a clerk and distributing the income among themselves were held not to be an association, In re Nizamuddin Amiruddin, 1934 I.T.R. 443 (Lah.). In a slightly different case in which the rents were realised jointly and credited in a joint account, the contrary view was taken, and the High Court declined to interfere. Haji Ghulam Husain v. Commissioner of Income-tax, N.-W.F.P., 1942 I.T.R. 405. Trustees of a wakf can be taxed as an association. Ibrahimji Hakimji v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind, 1940 I.T.R. 500.

The above quoted decisions are not entirely obsolete, even though the word "persons" has been substituted for 'individuals'; see, however, section 9 (3) introduced by the Amending Act of 1939 which provides for the taxation of members of an association individually in respect of income from house property under certain circumstances.

Members of an "association of persons" are exempted from tax a second time, in their hands, of their share of profits received by them if the profits have been taxed in the hands of the association. As regards their right to refund of tax paid by the association, see notes under section 48 which prima facie gives them no right to refund.

As to whether the members of a partnership prohibited under the law would form an "association of persons", see notes under section 2 (6-B). There is nothing to prevent the individual members of such prohibited partnerships being taxed in respect of income ultimately obtained by each individually.

Whether there is an association or not is a question of fact. For example, where a person inherits a share in a property, he may either remain in association with other co-sharers or become separate; and in either case, the actual position is a question of fact to be determined on evidence, the mere inheritance by itself not necessitating either conclusion. Accordingly, when certain co-heirs appointed one of themselves as agent to realise the shares of property left to them by their parents (under Muhammadan Law) and the Income-tax authorities held that the co-heirs constituted themselves into an association, the High Court declined to interfere, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Bapooria & others, 1939 I.T.R. 225.

Individual.—In Ahmedabad Millowners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, (1939) I.T.R. 369, it was held that the word 'individual' referred only to a human being and that the particular association, of which several of the members were companies, could not be an association of individuals. The ruling of the Privy Council in the case of Currimbhoy Ebrahim Baronctcy, 5 I.T.C. 484, in which it was held that the trustees together could be treated as an individual, was not considered in the above judgment or the case of Ram Ratandas and Madanagopal, (1935) I.T.R. 183 in which it was said that "it cannot be denied that the word 'individual' is wide enough to include a group of persons forming the unit." The Madras High Court preferred to follow Currimbhoy Trust v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 5 I.T.C. 484, rather than the Ahmedabad Millowners' case, 1939 I.T.R. 369, and held that the Salem District Urban Bank, an association composed both of individuals and of Co-operative Societies was an association of individuals. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Salem District Urban Bank, 1940 I.T.R. 264. The Madras Bar Council was held either to be an individual or association, 1943 I.T.R. 1.

Assessment of Income-tax on married women.—In the absence of a specific provision to the contrary in the Act, e.g., section 16 (3) a married woman has to be separately assessed in respect of her separate income. On this point the Income-tax Manual contains the following instructions:

Pensions received from funds such as the Indian Military Service Family Pension Fund by a widow on account of her children and on account of herself are distinct and separate from one another. The pension of a minor orphan paid to his or her mother or a duly appointed or recognised guardian should not be included in the taxable income of the mother or guardian for the purposes of income-tax assessment.

Composition not permissible.—Composition of taxes was given up in India in 1916.

In this connection, see Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Attorney-General, 7 Tax Cases 36, in which the Society produced correspondence with the Surveyor of Taxes and asked for a declaration that the correspondence amounted to a valid and binding agreement for the composition of tax for a certain number of years. It was held that the construction put by the Society on the correspondence was not correct and that even if it was, the agreement would be ultra vires and invalid.

Source of income—Existence of—In year of assessment.—In India the subject of charge is not the income of the year of assessment, but the income of the previous year; in the United Kingdom, on the other hand, the subject of assessment is the income of the year of assessment, though the amount is measured by a yardstick based on previous years. Maharajah of Pithapuram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 221 (P.C.).

In National Provident Institution v. Brown and Provident Mutual Life Assurance Association v. Ogston, 8 Tax Cases 57, it was held by the House of Lords, under the United Kingdom Income-tax Acts, that in order to be chargeable to income-tax for a particular year in respect of income from a source, a person must possess that source of income in that year. In Whelan v. Henning, 10 Tax Cases 263, it was held by the House of Lords that not only should the source exist but that income from the source should exist during the year of assessment. In Grainger v. Maxwell's Executors, 10 Tax Cases 139, it was held by the Court of Appeal that War Bonds were a different source of income from Exchequer Bills. None of these decisions, however, will apply to India, In re Beharilal Mullick, 54 Cal. 630; 2 I.T.C. 328; Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. v. Tehri Garhwal, 1934 I.T.R. 1 (P.C.); Maharajah of Pithapuram v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1945 I.T.R. 221 (P.C.). The United Kingdom Income-tax Acts are materially different in this respect from the Indian Income-tax Act. The law in the United Kingdom has, however, since been amended so as largely to get over these decisions of the House of Lords—see section 22 of the Finance Act of 1926.

Though the present tense is used in certain sections of the Indian Act, e.g., sections 9 and 10, it is clear, both from the charging sections and the general scheme of the Act, that the tax is levied on the income of the previous year and has to be levied independently of the existence of the source of income or income from that source during the year of assessment. The only anomaly in the scheme is in regard to deductions at source in respect of income from salaries and securities. Though section 18 requires the tax to be deducted in certain cases before it can be known, since the tax can be imposed only by the Finance Act of the next year, it is clear from the general arrangement of the Act that tax is collected in advance in anticipation of its imposition by the next Finance Act. Therefore in In re Beharilal Mullick, 54 Cal. 630; 2 I.T.C. 328, Rankin, C.J., observed that, the following words would better express the intention of the section:—

“Where any Act of the Indian Legislature enacts that income-tax shall be charged for any year at any rate or rates applicable to the total income of an assessee—

(1) tax at that rate or those rates shall be charged for that year in accordance with, and subject to the provisions of, this Act, in respect of all income, profits and gains of the previous year of every individual, company, firm, and Hindu undivided family;

(2) tax at that rate shall be deducted in accordance with, and subject to the provisions of, this Act from all salaries payable in that year on account of the income-tax, if any, to become chargeable in respect thereof for the following year; and

(3) tax at the maximum rate shall be deducted in accordance with, and subject to the provisions of, this Act from all interest upon securities payable in that year on account of the income-tax, if any, to become chargeable in respect thereof in the following year.”

The above ruling was followed by the Madras High Court in Karupiah Kangani's Case, 55 M.L.J. 844; A.I.R. 1929 Mad. 35, but dissented from by the Allahabad High Court in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Tehri Garhwal, 66 M.L.J. 127; A.I.R. 1934 P.C. 34; (1934) I.T.R. 1. In the latter which went up on appeal, the Privy Council referred with approval to the Calcutta ruling of In re Beharilal Mullick, though the appeal was dismissed on another point.

Losses in Burma.—The Income-tax Act cannot be treated as a statute passed annually. Therefore, when an assessee had incurred a loss in Burma in 1936-37, he was allowed to set it off against his profits in British India in respect of his assessment for the year 1937-38. The income of the previous year is not merely a guide to the ascertainment of the income of the assessment year but is the actual income to be assessed, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Valliammai Achi, (1938) I.T.R. 720; In re Rawji Dhanji & Co., 1940 I.T.R. 1 (Bom.).

Profits from unlawful or illegal businesses.—"It is a fallacy to say because the taxing authority levies from a person who is carrying on a profitable business, but an improper and illegal business or profession that therefore the authorities are countenancing such a profession * * * Their permission is not required and is not given, and cannot be withheld to a person who chooses to carry on an illegal business * * * The mere fact that the business is speculative, or even gaming and wagering within the meaning of that expression, does not make it any the less business. For example, supposing the question was one of profit made by a book-maker, as to whose business there can be no doubt whatever that it is entirely gaming and wagering * * * In the year 1886 the English Courts decided, and the decision has never been called in question, that a book-maker attending a race-course was carrying on a vocation, Partridge v. Mallandaine, (1886) 18 Q.B.D. 276. Where both the words "business" and "vocation" are used, it may be appropriate to describe a book-maker's business as a vocation, but the greater includes the less, and it is clearly included in the word 'business' in our opinion. The same view seems to have been taken in the text books on the subject with regard to the vocation of singer or prostitute, and the Calcutta High Court in the case of Birendra Kishore Manikya v. Secretary of State for India, 48 Cal. 766, held that illegal cesses were assessable to income-tax. * * * A large number of merchants and other people carry on extensive business of a speculative nature, which is not hit by the section in the Contract Act with regard to gaming, because, although the transaction may result in differences, the legal effect of the contract may be not to entitle the party to actual delivery. It is nonetheless speculative in character, and anybody concerned, with the daily business of the courts knows how difficult it is sometimes to ascertain whether a speculative transaction is really a gaming one or not. All such transactions, in our opinion, are business, and the profits arising therefrom are taxable under the Act," In re Chunnilal Kalyandas, 1 I.T.C. 418; 47 All. 372.

The question whether profits from illegal sources can be taxed was raised but not decided in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Mohideen Sahib, 2 I.T.C. 472; A.I.R. 1927 Mad. 1052, the High Court holding that no illegality had been proved in the case in respect of the source of income in issue.

The question has been before English Courts in several cases.

Per Scrutton, L.J.—"I rather think that Mr. J. Denman's language is used in a case as to betting which was invalid or unenforceable, not illegal. If he (Denman, J., in Partridge v. Mallandaine, 2 Tax Cases 179) meant to say that the Income-tax Acts recognise illegal businesses in the sense of businesses which it was not legal to carry on, because they were punishable, I at present very much doubt whether any such extension of the Acts is possible," Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Von Glehn & Co., 12 Tax Cases 232.

In an appeal to the Privy Council from Canada regarding the assessability of profits derived within Ontario from operations in illicit traffic in liquor which were prohibited by provincial legislation in that respect, Viscount Haldane delivering the judgment of the Board referred to the above remarks of Scrutton, L. J., in Von Glehn's case and refused to assent to the suggestion that Income-tax Acts are necessarily restricted in their application to lawful businesses only. So far as Parliaments with sovereign powers are concerned, they need not be so. The question is never more than one of the words used. It would not be appropriate to impart any assumed moral or ethical standard as controlling the literal interpretation of the language employed. It was ruled therefore that profits from 'boot-legging' were taxable, Minister of Finance v. Smith, (1927) A.C. 193.

The Supreme Court of the Irish Free State distinguished Canadian Minister of Finance v. Smith, (1927) A.C. 193, and held unanimously that profits from an illegal and criminal business were not liable to income-tax.

Per Kennedy, C.J.—"It is competent for the sovereign legislature to require crime to yield a quota out of its profits to national revenue. The question is whether on the construction of the statute, the legislature has done so. I have, after much consideration of the matter, come to, the definite opinion that income derived from criminal enterprises, that is to say, from enterprises prohibited by law and punishable as offences against the State, is not within the contemplation of the income-tax legislation, and while not expressly brought within that legislation cannot be supposed to be contemplated by it . . . the legislature cannot be supposed to contemplate the carrying on of that which it has prohibited and made criminal. . . I wish, however, to make it clear that this judgment is limited to the case of profits derived from a wholly unlawful business or enterprise or transaction. I am not prepared, as at present advised, to follow the view suggested by Scrutton, L.J., in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Von Glehn & Co., as to the case of lawful businesses carried on in whole or in part in an unlawful manner. As it does not arise in this case, I reserve it for future consideration

That (the Privy Council Canadian case above) was a case of Dominion legislation taxing profits from a source which in a particular province was illicit under the local legislation, a different question from that we have to determine."

Per Fitzgibbon, J.—" . . . the carrying on of a lottery of sweepstakes is a criminal act punishable by indictment and not merely a business which may be carried on subject to penalties. . . I can see a broad distinction between cases in which . . . the profits (of a lawful business) may have been derived from illegal methods of conducting it and cases such as the present one where the entire transaction or trade is illegal per se. . . I hold as Scrutton, L.J., was inclined to do in I. R. Commissioners v. Von Glehn & Co., that the Income-tax Acts are to be confined to lawful businesses though I am not prepared to add 'to the businesses carried on in a lawful manner'."

Per Murnaghan, J.—" . . . there is a clear distinction between the carrying on of a lawful business in the course of which acts prohibited by statute may or may not be committed and the setting up of an enterprise every act and step of which is a criminal offence. I do not believe that any well-ordered state can consider that its own criminal law will not be enforced. . . ." Hayes v. Duggan, (1929) Ir. R. 406.

In Mann v. Nash, 16 Tax Cases 523, Rowlatt, J., declined to follow the above Irish Free State ruling. In taxing profits from an illegal or unlawful transaction the state is not condoning it; it has not taken part in it but is merely looking at an accomplished fact and taxes profits if they have been made. There is no question of the state benefiting from its own turpitude or participating in unlawful transactions because there is nothing to prevent the state from prosecuting a person for the offence and at the same time taxing him on the profits. The above ruling was followed by Finlay, J., in Southern v. A. B.; Same v. A. B., Ltd., 12 A.T.C. 203, in which the assessee derived profits respectively from street betting and ready money betting the former of which was a statutory offence and the latter was illegal. A similar ruling was also given by the Scottish Court in Lindsay v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Tax Cases 43, in regard to profits from bootlegging in America. See also Graham v. Green, 9 Tax Cases 311, relating to profits from betting and book-making, referred to under section 4 (3) (vii).

In Sri Gopalji Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 32 P.L.R. 335, the Lahore High Court held that profits from a prohibited partnership, i.e., from one which was bound to register itself as a company because of the number of partners, was taxable.

Mutual Concerns—Profits from.—By special definition, section 2 (6-C), the profits of any business of insurance carried on by a mutual insurance association have been declared to be 'income'. In respect of other profits of mutual concerns, the law is laid down in judicial pronouncements. See however section 10 (6) regarding trade and professional associations.

"I do not think that the money received by a club from the members composing it can be regarded as 'income'—a word which itself seems to imply something received from outside," per Martineau, J., in United Service Club, Simla v. R., 1 I.T.C. 113; 2 Lah. 109.

"No man in my opinion can trade with himself; he cannot in my opinion make what is in its true sense or meaning taxable profit by dealing with himself," per Palles, C.B., in Dublin Corporation v. MacAdam, 2 Tax Cases 387; 20 Exch. Div. 497.

"I do not understand how persons contributing to a common fund in pursuance of a scheme for their mutual benefits, having no dealings or relations with any outside body, can be said to have made a profit when they find that they have overcharged themselves and that some portion of their contributions may be safely refunded. If profit can be made in that way there is a field for profitable enterprise capable, I suppose, of indefinite expansion," per Lord Macnaghten in New York Life Insurance v. Styles, 2 Tax Cases 460; 14 App. Cases 381.

The surplus of receipts over expenditure cannot be profits in the case of a club which does not 'trade' with non-members, per Martineau, J., in United Service Club, Simla v. R., 1 I.T.C. 113; 2 Lah. 109. On the other hand the Royal Calcutta Turf Club was held to carry on 'business' and make profits in respect of its receipts from non-members in exchange for advantages provided by the Club. The fees in question were (1) entrance fees to the stand, etc., (2) fees paid by owners of horses, (3) licence fees of bookmakers, (4) share of totalisator receipts, Royal Calcutta Turf Club v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 108; 48 Cal. 844.

Even a non-mutual association may sometimes be such as cannot make 'profits' in the strict sense of the term. A society founded for the diffusion of religious literature sold Bibles, etc., at a shop and sent out colporteurs to sell Bibles and act as cottage missionaries. Held, that this was not 'trade'.

Per the Lord President.—"When we turn to the methods . . . they were not commercial methods. . . The business carried on is not purely that of pushing the sale of their goods but . . . on the contrary the duty of the salesman is to dwell over the purchase and make it the occasion of administering religious advice and counsel," The Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland v. Forbes, 3 Tax Cases 415; 33 Sc.L.R. 289.

On the other hand in Grove v. The Young Men's Christian Association, 4 Tax Cases 613; 88 L.J. 679, in which the association ran a restaurant on commercial lines and open to the public, the restaurant was held to constitute a 'trade'.

In India, the scheme of taxation being different the taxation of such associations would depend not on whether they carried on a trade, giving rise to profits or gains but on whether they had income, profits and gains of a nature not exempted by the Act.

Whether an association is mutual or not is essentially one of fact. There is no legal definition of mutuality and one has first to determine with reference to the arrangements and transactions as a whole whether an association is mutual, and if it is mutual, then tax it on the income, profits and gains if any made from transactions with outsiders. If it is not mutual, the whole of its profits will be taxable, whether made from transactions with outsiders or not.

An assessee conducted a 'chit' fund as a stakeholder and under the rules of the 'chit' the subscriptions received from the members, minus 8 per cent. deducted by the stakeholder for expenses and charges including income tax were auctioned every month among the subscribers. The lowest bidder at each auction was paid his bid and the difference between this bid and the amount actually put up for auction was distributed as premium among the chit-holders in the shape of reduced subscriptions. The assessee was assessed to income-tax as an agent of the chit fund in respect of the entire premia distributed during the assessment year on the ground that such premia represented the profits of the fund. Held, that the sums represented by the premia were not assessable to income-tax as the transactions of the fund could not be said to bring any profit to the subscribers as a whole. Also, even if such premia could be regarded as income, the stakeholder could not be taxed on it as he had neither received it nor was entitled to receive it, Board of Revenue v. North Madras Mutual Fund, 1 I.T.C. 172.

A company limited by shares maintained a club. The club was managed by seven members, of whom at least five had to be shareholders in the company. The shareholders were not eligible as such for membership of the club, which was regulated by ballot, the voters being the already existing members. The company issued 445 shares, of which 74 were held by non-members of the club. The number of members of the club was 289, of whom 220 were not shareholders of the company. Held, that the company was not a mutual concern. The fact of incorporation could not be neglected, and the fact that some of the shareholders were members of the club was immaterial, In re Dibrugarh Club, Ltd., 2 I.T.C. 521; 55 Cal. 971. Following this ruling, the Judicial Commissioner's Court at Nagpur, decided in The Maharaj Bagh Club, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 5 I.T.C. 201, that the club in which the majority of the using members were not members of the owning company was not a mutual institution.

Where a member of an unincorporated club orders a dinner there is no sale, the point is that the whole property is vested in all the members. Where, however, there is a separate entity, e.g., a company, the test whether the club is mutual may depend on whether the persons who pay and the persons who benefit are identical. On the other hand, where there is no such entity, as in an ordinary club, you cannot isolate the dining room, library and so forth; since while the members have a right to participate in the whole each participates only in a part. So, when profits were made by an unincorporated association from a holiday camp to which visitors were admitted on payment, tax was confined to profits made from non-members, National Association of Local Government Officers v. Watkins, 13 A.T.C. 268: 18 Tax Cases 499.

The Mylapore Hindu Permanent Fund consisted of shareholders who subscribed one rupee per month on which a certain rate of interest was guaranteed and the funds were lent out among the shareholders themselves, or occasionally invested in securities or Bank deposits. The profits consisted of (1) the interest paid by borrowers, (2) penalties levied on shareholders, (3) interest on securities and Bank deposits. It was held by the Madras High Court following New York Life Insurance Co. v. Styles, 2 Tax Cases 460, and distinguishing Leeds Permanent, etc., Society v. Mallandaine, 3 Tax Cases 577, that (3) was taxable but (1) and (2) were not, Board of Revenue v. The Mylapore Hindu Permanent Fund, Ltd., 47 Mad. 1; 1 I.T.C. 217.

A company, partly with permanent capital divided into 'shares' and partly with fluctuating capital called 'subscriptions', received deposits from its 'shareholders' and 'subscribers' as well as from outsiders, and lent moneys to all the three classes, the greater part of the transactions being with outsiders. Held, that the society was not 'mutual' and that its entire profits were taxable, Trichinopoly Tennore Permanent Fund, Ltd v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 53 M.L.J. 881 (F.B.). The company, thereupon, altered its memorandum by creating a new class of shares of small value and allotting them to the persons who would, under the old scheme, be non-member borrowers, but, while a substantial part of the profits was made out of the interest received from these borrower-members of the new class, the bulk of the dividends was paid to the other classes of members. It was held, therefore, that the real nature of the society had not changed and that it was still not mutual, Trichinopoly Tennore Permanent Fund, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1937 I.T.R. 703; I.L.R. 1938 Mad. 183; A.I.R. 1938 Mad. 148.

A society, though including among its members Co-operative Societies, which does ordinary banking business with non-members is not a mutual concern. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Salem District Urban Bank, 1940 I.T.R. 269.

After reviewing the following authorities, viz., New York Life Insurance Co. v. Styles, 2 Tax Cases 460; Last v. London Assurance Corporation,

10 A.C. 438; Equitable Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, 4 Tax Cases 147; Liverpool Corn Trade Association v. Monks, 10 Tax Cases 442; Thomas v. Richard Evans & Co., 11 Tax Cases 790; Cornish Mutual Assurance Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 841, the Madras High Court held in the case of the English and Scottish Joint Co-operative Society, 3 I.T.C. 385 (not registered in British India under the Co-operative Societies Act, 1912) that the so-called profits derived from the sale of produce to the only two members of the Society who were also Co-operative Societies were merely the return of excess payments, and that the fact that a part of this return took the shape of a fixed rate of interest on capital subscribed by the two member Societies while the rest took that of a pro rata dividend on the purchases made no difference to the true nature of this notional profit. The profit was therefore not taxable. The Crown's argument was that it was open to the Society to take other Societies also as members and that the interest paid to each member which was really like a preference dividend bore no relation to the purchases made by that member.

In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Madura Hindu Permanent Fund, Ltd., 56 Mad. 415; 1933 I.T.R. 46, a Full Bench of the Madras High Court again reviewed the authorities and held that the Mylapore Fund, 47 Mad. 1, supra and the English and Scottish Joint Co-operative Society's cases, 3 I.T.C. 385 were rightly decided though strictly speaking they were not governed by the New York case the facts being materially different. The guaranteed interest was interest earned by the fund and not a return of a surplus arising from an overestimate. These funds were not really companies but mutual benefit societies and the subscriptions were not really share capital though called as such. Moreover, even if a profit was considered to be earned by them from the transactions with members, the guaranteed interest paid to shareholders ought to be deducted since it is paid on capital borrowed for the purpose of the business and is not dependent on its earning of profits. See however Explanation under section 10 (2) (iii).

In a later case in which the facts were similar, the same High Court explained that there was no conflict between the decisions in the Mylapore and the Madura Fund cases. These funds, though registered as companies were really mutual benefit societies, with fluctuating capital; and the Court was not therefore prepared to re-open the decision in the Mylapore Case, Tanjore Permanent Fund, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1937 I.T.R. 160.

Where a Nidhi transacted business, viz., taking deposits and giving loans, both with members and with outsiders and the share capital was payable in a lump sum, though it carried a guaranteed interest, it was held that the business was not mutual, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Sriman Madhwa Siddhanta Nidhi, Ltd., 7 I.T.C. 317; 58 M. 8, 13.

Collister, J., observed with reference to the Mylapore Fund Case. "The question does not seem to have been considered whether a mutual concern can trade with its members and whether the payment and receipt of interest on loans advanced might not amount to a money-lending business between the association and its members", Chamber of Commerce, Hapur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1936 I.T.R. 397; 58 All. 1003.

A golf club, not a 'company', and admittedly a bona fide members' club, was bound under a clause in its lease to admit non-members to play on its course on payment of green fees to be fixed by the lessors but subject to a minimum fixed in the lease. These green fees were paid by the non-members and entered into the general accounts of the Club, which showed an annual excess of receipts over expenditure. Held, that the Club, in so far as it admitted non-members, carried on, for income-tax purposes, a concern or business capable of being isolated and defined and in respect of which it received profits that were liable to tax, Carlisle and Silloth Golf Club v. Smith, 6 Tax Cases 198; (1913) 3 K.B. 75.

Per Kennedy, L.J.—" . . . It is not, therefore, the common case of a golf club which admits to the use of its accommodation players who are introduced by a member or are approved by the club committee, and who, upon such introduction or approval, and upon payment according to the rules of the club, are admitted to the privileges of members, according to the rules of the club, for some specified period. It is not necessary to decide the point, but in such a case, I am inclined to think the persons to whom such privileges are accorded might fairly be regarded as becoming, for the time, members of the club, subscribing to its funds. But upon the facts appearing in the case, it appears to me that this club is really carrying on the business of supplying to the public for reward a recreation ground fitted for the enjoyment of the game of golf, and that the receipts derived from this business are in the nature of profits and gains in respect of which it is liable to assessment for income-tax", Carlisle and Silloth Golf Club v. Smith, supra.

The local golf clubs and the Town Council in a certain town entered into an agreement and vested the control of the golf links in a Committee. The town Council contributed towards a part of the upkeep of banks and bridges. The subscriptions leviable from users were fixed except as regards visitors. Held, that the Committee carried on a trade. The case was not like that of a club, and the fact that the Committee could not increase the fees was no reason to hold that there was no trade, Carnoustie Golf Course Committee v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1929) S.C. 419; 8 A.T.C. 205; 14 Tax Cases 498.

In Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Stonehaven Recreation Ground Trustees, 8 A.T.C. 523; 15 Tax Cases 419, the grounds were open to all members of the public who had to take season tickets of varying duration. Six of the nine trustees were appointed from year to year by the season ticketholders. The rates for tickets were so regulated as to cover the expenditure and not to make any surplus. Held, that the institution was not "mutual", since the ticket purchasers were not received into any body incorporated or incorporate.

A mutual life insurance company had no members except the holders of participating policies, to whom all the assets of the company belonged. At the close of each year an actuarial valuation was made, and the surplus, if any, was divided between the participating policyholders, who received their dividends in the shape either of a cash reduction from future premiums, or of a reversionary addition to the amount of their policies. The surplus divided consisted partly of the excess of the premiums paid by the participating policyholders, over and above the cost of their insurances, and partly of profits arising from non-participating policies, the sale of life annuities, and other business conducted by the Society with non-members. Held, by the House of Lords, per Lords Watson, Bramwell, Herschell and Macnaghten (Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lord Fitzgerald, dissenting), that so much of the surplus as arose from the excess contributions of the participating policyholders is not profit assessable to the income-tax, New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles, 2 Tax Cases 460; 14 A.C. 381.

The principle of this decision is, in the words of Lord Watson, that "when a number of individuals agree to contribute funds for a common purpose, such as the payment of annuities or of capital sums to some or all of them on the occurrence of events, certain or uncertain, and stipulate that their contributions so far as they are not required for the purpose shall be paid back to them, the contributions so returned should not be regarded as profits."

In distinguishing this case from Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 2 Tax Cases 100; 14 Q.B.D. 389, Lord Watson said:

"In Styles' case there are no shares or shareholders in the ordinary sense of the term, but each and every shareholder of a participating policy becomes ipso facto a partner in the company with a voice in the administration, entitled to a share in the assets and liable for all losses incurred by it."

The fact that the New York Insurance Company was incorporated did not make any difference. It is seen from Lord Herschell's judgment that the Attorney-General conceded that the incorporation did not affect the issue. Lord Macnaghten pointed out that, so far as participating policyholders are concerned, the company was not formed for making profits, every member taking a participating policy becoming ipso facto a member of the company.

This decision makes it clear that the business done with the members by such a Society is of a different nature from the business done with non-members. It should not be inferred from this, however, that in every case the profits resulting from business with members should be separated from the profits from business with outsiders and the latter taxed. If this were so it would be necessary, for instance, to exempt from taxation profits made by a Bank in lending to its shareholders or by a Railway in carrying its shareholders. The test is not whether the corporate body deals with its individual members or not but whether the body is in its essence a 'mutual' body. That is, does it so arrange with its members that the surplus is automatically returned to the members? And does it primarily do business with its own members and only incidentally with outsiders?

Under the law of the State of New York a share capital of $100,000 is required to be subscribed by every Life Insurance Society and to be invested in securities. The shareholders of a society established under this law were, by their Charter, entitled to receive a dividend not exceeding seven per cent. per annum. The earnings of the Society over and above the dividends, losses and expenses, were to be accumulated, and every five years after actuarial valuation each participating policyholder was to be credited with a portion of the available surplus. The Society was managed by Directors appointed by the shareholders. The Charter gave power to the Directors to provide that each policyholder of $5,000 should be entitled to vote at the annual election of Directors, but this power had not been exercised. The Society granted non-participating policies as well as participating, and did other business, the profits from all sources going to form the surplus. The Society had a branch in London, and it was claimed that the profits of the branch were not assessable to income-tax. Held, that the profits were assessable, the case being governed by Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 2 Tax Cases 100; 14 Q.B.D. 389 (set out under section 10, infra). Equitable Life Assurance Society of United States v. Bishop, 4 Tax Cases 147; (1900) 1 Q.B. 177.

An annuity or other recurring payment, e.g., sums paid during disablement, is taxable irrespective of whether the concern paying it is 'mutual' or not. The fact that the payments may be variable or contingent would not affect the liability to tax. (Forsyth v. Thompson, 1941 I.T.R. (Sup.) 5 (K.B.D.).

In National Mutual Life Association of Australasia v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, (1936) I.T.R. 44; A.I.R. 1936 P.C. 55, it was accepted by both parties before the Privy Council that the principles laid down in Styles' case apply in India, and the Privy Council, therefore, expressed no opinion in the matter. The law in British India as from 1st April, 1939, is governed by the special definition in section 2 (6-C) which makes profits of mutual insurance taxable.

A Building Society, whose members consisted of investors and borrowers, made advances to the latter upon the security of their properties. In all cases the advance was made in respect of one or more shares which the borrower took in the Society, and upon each of which he paid 2s. 6d. per week in repayment of the advance, together with interest thereon. The Society refused to allow deduction of income-tax by the borrowers in respect of the interest included in the repayments, on the grounds that the interest could not be distinguished, and that it was not "annual" interest. Held, that the Society was liable to assessment on the interest received, whether it be annual or not, Lcds Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Mallandaine, 3 Tax Cases 577 (1897) (referred to in the Mylapore Fund case).

A dividend or rebate received by a member of a Co-operative Society on his purchases therefrom is taxable as part of the receipts of his own trade for the purpose of which he makes the purchases from the society. Pope v. Beaumont, (K.B.D.) 1943 I.T.R. 33 (Sup.).

A Co-operative Society which buys milk from its members and sells it to outsiders is making taxable profits, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sparkford Vale Co-operative Society, 12 Tax Cases 891; 133 L.T. 231.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"It has no profit from buying milk from its own members and if the public to whom they sell do not pay for it, they do not get any profits at all. . . . The profits are made by the selling of the article, not by the buying of it at all in the meaning of this subsection."

The question in the above case arose with reference to the Corporation Profits Tax Act which exempted profits of such societies arising from "trading with its own members"; but the principle enunciated by Rowlatt, J., is capable of extension to income-tax also. No profits would arise, if the Society bought from outside and sold to its members only.

A company was formed to take over a Social Club. There was no share capital and the members of the company were the same as the members of the Club. In substance the incorporation had not affected the members inter se or their relations to the Club. Held, that a business or trade or undertaking of similar character was not being carried on by the company.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Eccentric Club, Ltd., 12 Tax Cases 657; (1925) A.C. 476. This decision, however, was overruled in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Cornish Mutual Insurance Co., 12 Tax Cases 841; (1926) A.C. 281 (H.L.).

A company limited by guarantee was formed for carrying on insurance other than life insurance. The number of members was unlimited. Every person taking out a contract became a member automatically and remained as such during the currency of the contract. Each new member paid an entrance fee. The directors were empowered to set aside sums for reserve and make calls on shareholders for general expenses. There was no subscribed capital. The sums insured were adjusted according to risk so as to make the contributions of members equitable. Held, that for the purposes of the Corporation Profits Tax the Act regulating which specifically said that the surplus of mutually trading concerns was to be deemed to be profits the company was carrying on a 'trade' though it was not liable to income-tax, Cornish Mutual Assurance Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 841. In the New York Insurance case, 2 Tax Cases 460 all that had been decided was that the profits were not taxable, not that a Mutual company could not do business. On the other hand, In re Arthur Average Association, 10 Ch.D. 542 and In re Padstow Total Loss and Collision Assurance Association, (1882) 20 Ch.D. 137 (both cases under Companies Act) are authorities for the position that a mutual association could do business. These two cases had not been considered in Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 2 Tax Cases 100; or New York Insurance Society v. Styles, 2 Tax Cas. 460.

In the case of the Commissioner of Income-tax v. National Mutual Life Association of Australasia, A.I.R. 1931 Bom. 448; 55 Bom. 637, it was held by the Bombay High Court that while profits from the participating branch of a mutual life insurance company in which the members are the participating policyholders are not taxable, the profits from the non-participating policies and from investments (less expenses) were taxable. On a later occasion however in the case of the same association, it was held by the same Court. 57 Bom. 519; A.I.R. 1933 Bom. 427; (1933) I.T.R. 350 following the Cornish Mutual Case that though a mutual institution, it nevertheless did business and that as a consequence, being a non-resident company, it was liable to be taxed under section 42 on its income from investments abroad of the premia from participating policies in British India, such income arising from business connection in British India. This judgment, however, was overruled by the Privy Council, (1936) I.T.R. 44. Any claim as to liability under section 42 was outside the Commissioner's reference and irrelevant to the questions submitted, and the Privy Council were, therefore, not concerned with the question on the merits of which they expressed no opinion. They overruled the judgment on the ground that it ignored the principle of Styles' case and taxed profits from participating policyholders. See however section 2 (6-C) which renders these rulings obsolete.

The Liverpool Corn Trade Association was a company formed to promote the interests of the corn trade by Parliamentary and other action; to adjust disputes between persons engaged in the trade; to provide, regulate and maintain an exchange, market and room for the corn trade in Liverpool; and to establish and maintain a clearing-house for the clearance of contracts. Shares could be held only by persons engaged in the corn trade and no member could hold less than one or more than two shares. The second share could be requisitioned by the company for a new member if no shares were otherwise available. In addition to the members there were also subscribers who were elected from time to time by the directors but had no shares and no right to vote and merely enjoyed the services and facilities provided by the Association. All the fees and subscriptions belonged to the Association absolutely and were disposed of at the discretion of the directors. The directors could set aside sums to the credit of a reserve fund and recommended the payment of dividends which had to be declared by the Association in a general meeting but as a matter of fact no dividends had been declared for nearly 20 years. It was contended by the Association that the transactions with the members were mutual and the resulting profits not liable to tax. The profits made from non-members were admitted to be liable to tax. Held, that the profit was assessable to tax even though it resulted from transactions with the members.

Per Rowlatt, J.—" . . . where as in the New York Life Insurance case there is no share capital and no shareholders, but the policy-holders are called members of the company, so that they may vote at meetings, then it does not matter whether or not there is an incorporation, because * * * the corporation is merely an entity which stands at the back, and all it is doing is to collect from the policy-holders certain funds and hand them back again so far as they are not wanted. . . . [In a case like that it does not matter whether there is an incorporation or not, because there is nothing belonging to the corporation which is severable from what belongs to the aggregation of individuals. . . .] But in a case of this kind, where there is a company with a share-capital and share-holders with a right to dividends if declared, upon the share capital, coupled with a dealing by the company with the persons who happen to be the owners of the share capital, affording benefits to those persons individually, for which they pay money by way of subscriptions and by way of entrance fees as a sort of over-riding subscription, if I may use that word, which opens the door to subscriptions, there is no reason at all for disregarding the fact that the company is incorporated or for regarding otherwise than as profits the difference which is obtained by dealings between that corporation and the persons who happen to be its members. . . .", Liverpool Corn Trade Association, Ltd. v. Monks, 5 A.T.C. 288; 10 Tax Cases, 422; (1926) 2 K.B. 110 at p. 123.

The income of a Chamber of Commerce (of corn merchants) registered as a limited liability company consisted of: (a) admission fees and subscription from members; (b) registration fees of grain pits; and (c) commission on forward contracts; (c) being the most important. If a non-member was a party to a contract, he had to register it through a member whom alone the chamber recognised. The Income-tax authorities exempted (a) but not (b) and (c), which they taxed, not as income from business but as income from "other sources". It was held that (i) the company was not exempt merely because it had been registered under the Companies Act under section 26 thereof, i.e., as an association not formed for earning profits; (ii) the income from (b) and (c) was not from any source other than business but as the Income-tax authorities had found otherwise, it could not be differentiated from (a) and was therefore exempt, Chamber of Commerce, Hapur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., (1936) I.T.R. 397; 58 All. 1003. The Karachi Chamber of Commerce, registered under section 26 of the Indian Companies Act, in which no bonus or dividend was payable and the property of which, on dissolution, was to pass to similar institutions maintained a Public Measurer, for whose work, which was done both for members and for outsiders, the Chamber received fees. There was no dispute as to the non-taxability of the member's subscriptions or as to the taxability of the profits made from outsiders, and the dispute was confined to the taxability of profits made from members. The Crown failed. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Karachi Chamber of Commerce, 1939 I.T.R. 575. In Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Karachi Indian Merchants' Association, 1939 I.T.R. 594, the Association had no transactions with outsiders; and the following items were held to be not taxable: (1) fees on delivery orders recorded by the Chamber Clearing House; (2) sale proceeds of samples tendered to the Clearing House for analysis against delivery contracts; and (3) penalties received from members for trading in contravention of the rules of the association. It should be noted that all these rulings were given before the insertion in the Act of sub-section (6) of section 10 which seeks to tax "a trade, professional or similar association performing specific services for its members for remuneration definitely related to those services."

In another case the assesseees were a company formed to indemnify the members against claims on account of workmen's compensation. The members were colliery owners. Each member had to contribute on the basis of the wages paid by him. The contributions went into a general fund from which sums were from time to time transferred to a reserve fund. The general fund was the primary fund for meeting claims. Part of the risk was reinsured. Members could retire on giving six months' notice and a retiring member was entitled to take with him his proportion of the reserve fund minus his proportion of the expenses and liabilities of the association up to the date of his retirement. The Special Commissioners felt some difficulty in reconciling the New York Life Insurance Case, 2 Tax Cases 460, with Salomon v. Salomon & Co., Ltd., (1897) A.C. 22. Held, that the profits made by the company were not taxable.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"It is true to say that a person cannot make a profit out of himself if what is meant is that he may provide himself with something at a less cost, than that at which he could buy it, or if he does something for himself instead of employing some one to do it. He saves money in those circumstances, but he does not make a profit. But a company can make a profit out of its members as customers, although its range of customers is limited to its shareholders. If a railway company makes a profit by carrying its shareholders, or if any other trading company, by trading with its shareholders even if it is limited to trading with them, makes a profit, that profit belongs to the share-holders in a sense but it belongs to them qua shareholders. It does not come back to them as purchasers or customers; it comes back to them as share-holders upon their shares. Where all that a company does is to collect money from a certain number of people—it matters not whether they are called members of the company or participating policy-holders—and apply it for the benefit of those same people, not as shareholders in the company, but as people who subscribed it, then, as I understand Styles' case, there is no profit. If the people were to do the thing for themselves, there would be no profit and the fact that they incorporate a legal entity to do it for them makes no difference; there is still no profit. This is not because the entity of the company is to be disregarded; it is because there is no profit, the money being simply collected from those people and handed back to them not in the character of shareholders, but in the character of those who have paid it. That, as I understand, is the effect of the decision in Styles' case. The money subscribed by the Colliery Company is used for its protection; the fund belongs to it and a large amount is kept in hand. No doubt as the money is not distributed year by year, and the calls are not limited to the actual losses, but to enable a fund to be built up, it may in a sense be said that the Association has a fund which it holds as a company and which it does not divide among all the people who have built it up, inasmuch as members may come in when the fund has been legally built up, and so there is a fund which does not go back to those people who subscribed it individually. That, however, must I think, have been so in Styles' case too because there was there a reserve fund which involves that when a life dropped and the assured's representatives were paid the amount due upon the policy, with bonus additions, there was still something left in the hands of the company beyond what was necessary to pay the claims as they become due. The broad principle was there laid down that, if the interest in the money does not go beyond the people or the class of people who subscribed it, then, just as there is no profit earned by the people subscribing, if they do the thing for themselves, so there is none if they get a company to do it for them."—Jones v. South-West Lancashire Coal-owners' Association and Thomas v. Richard Evans & Co., 6 A.T.C. 641; 11 Tax Cases 790; (1927) 1 K.B. 33 at p. 47.

Both the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal confirmed Mr. Justice Rowlatt's judgment. The House of Lords considered that Styles' case covered cases of this kind, (1927) A.C. 827.

A company consisting of representatives of local authorities was formed primarily to enable such authorities and other public bodies by co-operation to insure against fire and other risks on the most favourable terms. No part of the company's income or property could be paid or transferred as dividend or bonus or otherwise by way of profit to the members who were liable in the event of winding up to contribute a certain amount under certain conditions. The company carried on: (a) fire insurance; (b) employees' liability; and (c) miscellaneous insurance. The Crown conceded that (a) was 'mutual' because (i) under the constitution the members of the company were in effect the fire policy-holders and (ii) on a winding up they alone were entitled to the surplus assets. The company on the other hand conceded that (b) and (c) were not mutual in so far as business was done with other than fire policy-holders. The question in issue therefore was whether profits from (b) and (c) in so far as the business was done with fire policy-holders was taxable. In view of the following facts, viz., (1) premia for (b) and (c) were fixed, and not fluctuating, while premia for (a) were varied from time to time; (2) ineligibility of (b) and (c) class policy-holders as such to surplus assets in the event of winding up; (3) surpluses from (b) and (c) class policies were dealt with on the same footing whether the policies were with fire policy-holders or not it was held that the business under (b) and (c) was not mutual, Municipal Mutual Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Hills, 16 Tax Cases 430 (H.L.); 48 T.L.R. 301.

The above ruling was distinguished in a case in which the articles of association of a Company formed for the purpose of insuring its members who were millowners provided inter alia that the directors may after a certain time ascertain and distribute the profits among the members. The power was however not exercised, and the Bombay High Court held that the existence of the power was immaterial, and that the general principle enunciated by the New York case covered such a case, the Company being mutual and the profits in question not being taxable. In re Millowners' Mutual Insurance Association, Ltd., 135 I.C. 813; 33 Bom.L.R. 158.

Where shareholders are different from policy-holders, an insurance business cannot be mutual and its income is not exempt from tax on that account, however small the interests of the shareholders as against those of the policy-holders, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Central Popular Assurance Co., Ltd., 1939 I.T.R. 293; Commissioner of Income-tax v. Sind Central Provident Funds Society, Ltd., 1939 I.T.R. 333; Commissioner of Income-tax v. Indian Relief and Benefit Insurance Co., Ltd., 1939 I.T.R. 341.

United Kingdom Law.—Section 31 of the United Kingdom Finance Act of 1933 makes liable to tax the profits of companies arising from transactions with their members on the same basis as profits from transactions with non-members and permits at the same time the deduction, from profits, of discounts, rebates, dividends and bonuses paid to members so long as these are paid on the transactions and not on the shares or other interest of the members. The question arose in Ayershire Employer's Mutual Insurance Association v. Inland Revenue, (C.S.) 1944, whether this change in the law, which was primarily intended to cover co-operative societies makes liable to tax the profits of a mutual insurance company from such insurance and was answered in the negative. 'Mutual' insurance is exempt not because the transactions are with members but because, to quote Lord Cave in Jones v. South-West Lunar Coal Association, 11 Tax Cas. 790, "sooner or later in meal or in malt, the whole of the company's receipts must go back to the policy-holders as a class, though not precisely in the proportions in which they have contributed to them, and the association does not in any true sense make a profit out of these contributions". Section 31 of the Finance Act of 1933 did not say that all transactions between a company and its members are to be taxed but only that these transactions should be treated as though they were with outsiders; and it is not indisputable that transactions of a mutual nature should be carried on only with members.

The definition of section 2 (6-C) of the Indian Act which uses the words "the profits of a mutual insurance association" avoids all these difficulties; and the profits of such an association will be caught irrespective of whether the transactions are with members or others.

Destination of profits—Does not affect liability to tax.—The destination of the income, profits or gains is immaterial, so long as it is income, profits or gains to the assessee which is sought to be taxed. See Paddington Burial Board v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 Tax Cases 46; 13 Q.B.D. 9 (Profits applied in aid of poor rates); Mercy Docks v. Lucas, 2 Tax Cases 25; 8 App. Cases 891 (Profits applied to creating a sinking fund for extinguishing debts).

Per the Lord Chancellor.—"The word 'profits'.....does mean the incomings of the concern after deducting the expenses of earning and obtaining them, before you come to an application of them even to the payment of creditors of the concern.....The gains of a trade are that which is gained by the trading, for whatever purposes it is used, whether it is gained for the benefit of the community, or for the benefit of individuals....."

Also Sowrey v. King's Lyn Harbour Moorings Commissioners, 2 Tax Cases 201; 3 T.L.R. 516 and City of Dublin Steam Packet Company v. O'Brien, 6 Tax Cases 101. In Blake v. Imperial Brazilian Ry., 2 Tax Cases 58, it was held that the whole of the guaranteed interest received from Government devoted to payment of debenture interest and to payment of sinking fund was taxable, Nizam's Guaranteed Railway v. Wyatt, 2 Tax Cases 584 is a case exactly similar to the Brazilian Railway case above.

The compulsory application of income to a specific purpose does not prevent it from being income, Tenant v. Smith, 3 Tax Cases 158 at p. 165; Harris v. Corporation of Irvine, 4 Tax Cases 221 at p. 232; Smyth v. Stretton, 5 Tax Cases 36 nor does it relieve the income from liability to taxation, Mersey Docks v. Lucas, 1 Tax Cases 385; Trustees of Mary Clark Home v. Anderson, 5 Tax Cases 48; (1904) 2 K.B. 645.

"Profits" should be understood in its natural and proper sense which no commercial man would misunderstand, per Halsbury, L.C., in Gresham Insurance Co. v. Styles, 3 Tax Cases 93 and when once an individual (or a company) has ascertained the profits in the proper sense, it is immaterial what becomes of the profits—whether any charge has been made on these profits by previous agreement or otherwise, Pondicherry Railway Co., Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 58 I.A. 239; 54 M. 691 (P.C.). The same view was repeated by the Privy Council in Bharat Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1934) I.T.R. 63 (P.C.); A.I.R. 1934 P.C. 45.

Trusts.—See sections 40 and 41 and notes thereunder as to who should be taxed, whether trustee or beneficiary, and on what basis.

Income, profits or gains withheld at source.—Difficult problems arise when a portion of the income, profits or gains is withheld at the source before the income reaches the assessee. The test to be applied in such cases is whether the withholding merely represents the payment of a personal debt or liability of the assessee, i.e., a diversion of his income or represents a share in the income itself to which the assessee has only a residual claim after the prior claims have been met. In the former case the withheld income clearly belongs to the assessee and is taxable, while in the latter case it is not. In other words, the test is whether there is an effective alienation of the income at the source, i.e., before the assessee can claim it. The test, however, is a difficult one to apply as will be seen from the decided cases.

Salary attached to pay a debt is liable to tax. See Income-tax Manual.

Tax withheld at source—Income of assessee.—The income-tax which is withheld at source is clearly part of the assessee's income and of this there can be little doubt. Ex-majore cautela, however, section 18 (4) makes this quite clear. The tax is a personal liability of the assessee and it is only the convenience of the administrative machinery that is responsible for the tax being collected at source.

Encumbered property—Income from.—Per Lord Davey in London County Council v. Attorney-General, 4 Tax Cases 265—"It was no doubt considered that the real income of an owner of incumbered property or of property charged, say with an annuity under a will, is the annual income of the property less the interest on the incumbrance or the annuity".

This was explained by Lord Macnaghten in Attorney-General v. London County Council, 5 Tax Cases 242, to mean that the charge for the interest or the annuity ought to be a real burden.

"If the interest or the annuity is discharged by some person other than the incumbered owner or deviser without recourse to such owner or deviser the burden is nominal."

The decree of a Court charging the whole resources of an assessee with a specific payment for maintenance to his step-mother does to that extent divert his income from him and direct it to his step-mother. What he received for her is not his income. It is not a case of the application by the assessee of a part of his income in a particular way; it is rather the allocation of a sum out of his revenue before it becomes income in his hands. The charge had not been created for the payment of debts voluntarily incurred; and the position was the same as if he had received a bequest with an annuity charged on the property. The "all income" referred to in this section (now "total income") is what reaches the assessee as income and the view is confirmed by the absence of provision in the Act to allow of deduction of tax at source (the provisions of section 18 of the Indian Act are restricted and not general like similar provisions in the United Kingdom Law). It is not reasonable to postulate an intention to impose, without right of reimbursement, a tax on what is only a charge on the income, Raja Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, (1933) 1.T.R. 135 (P.C.); 60 Cal. 1029. Where a sole surviving male member of a Hindu undivided family came into possession of immovable property as a residuary legatee, subject, by decree of Court, to payments for maintenance of widows who were members of the family, it was held, following Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 60 I.A. 196, that the net income only was taxable in the hands of the male member as an individual, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. D. R. Naik, 1939 I.T.R. 362. A similar view was taken in Raja Shiva Prasad Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 1942 I.T.R. 249, in which the owner of a Hindu impartible estate paid maintenance allowances to the widow of the predecessor, under the orders of a Court. And, generally, when an annuity is charged by a testator on property bequeathed, the annuity is not part of the income of the residuary legatee; but if the legatee himself creates the charge, the annuity would be a diversion of his income. Jagdischandra v. Dhanpati Singh, 1945 I.T.R. 64 (Pat.).

In applying the principle of the ruling in Raja Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1933 I.T.R. 135 (P.C.), it should be remembered that a Hindu widow's claim to maintenance does not in itself constitute a charge on the estate of the deceased husband for this purpose. Such a charge will arise only if there is a decree of a Court or an agreement between the widow and the representative of the husband's estate or if the will of the husband creates such a charge, In re Charusila Dasi, 1937 I.T.R. 1. Where a will directs certain payments to be made "out of the income of my property" the payments can be made by the executors only out of what they receive as the income of the property. Such payments, consequently are not a deduction of income in favour of some one else before it reaches the executors who are therefore taxable on the whole income without deduction of the payments. In re Mallik and D. C. Aich, 1940 I.T.R. 236 (Cal.). Where the owner of a mine mortgaged it to his creditor for a debt to whom at the same time he leased it for a royalty and the arrangement was that the excess of the royalty over a stipulated minimum payable to the mortgagor was to be utilised by the lessee gradually in repayment of the debt, it was held that the entire royalty was the income of the mortgagor. This was a case of application by him of his income in a particular manner, Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Manager, Katra's Estate, 1934 I.T.R. 100.

In Macdonald & Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 37 Bom.L.R. 128; 1935 I.T.R. 459, where the assessee had covenanted to pay a person a share of his own gross income (not a share of profits), and there was no charge on the estate, it was held that the payment was not deductible, the position being nearer to that in the Pondicherry Railway case than to that in the Dudhuria case. The correctness of this decision has however been doubted in Tata Hydro Electric Agencies v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1937 I.T.R. 202; 64 I.A. 215; 1937 A.C. 212.

Where income from mortgaged property has in no sense been earmarked or allocated for the purpose of paying the interest, the income from the property continues to be that of the mortgagor, In re Amulya Dhone Addy and others, 1936 I.T.R. 164; 63 Cal. 1157; A.I.R. 1937 Cal. 369. That case, however, was under section 9, and the main question was whether a deduction could be claimed for interest on mortgage of a part of the property of a Hindu undivided family by one of its members.

A distribution of dividend on condition that an equivalent loan is made by the shareholder to the company is not a distribution of income at all. Inland Revenue v. Marbob, 18 A.T.C. 257 (K.B.).

As to how far a charge on land can give rise to 'agricultural income', see notes under section 2 (1); and as to how far maintenance allowances can be deducted in respect of impartible families, see notes under section 2 (9).

Where, under a trust deed, the widow of the person who created the trust was entitled to maintenance out of the income of the trust and the estate vested in a Hindu undivided family, it was held that notwithstanding the absence of any specific amount fixed for maintenance by the deed the allowance paid to the widow should be deducted from the income of the family. Whether there is a charge or not is a matter primarily of determination of the legal position of the allowance paid out, In re Madan Mohan & Bros., 1938 I.T.R. 315 (Cal.).

Where a widow who was also administratrix of her husband's estate claimed successfully before the Income-tax authorities that certain expenditure incurred by her for her own benefit from the income of the estate in accordance with her husband's will should be excluded from the taxable income of the estate and the Income-tax Officer thereupon taxed her in her personal capacity on the amount excluded from the income of the estate, she claimed that the amounts spent for her benefit were not her income since she merely received lodging, board, etc., which could not be converted into money. It was held, in view of her attitude in respect of the assessment of the estate, that the case was one of her spending what she received from the estate on her board, lodging, etc., and not one of her receiving such board, lodging, etc., in such a manner that she could not convert it into money, In re Charusila Dasi, 1937 I.T.R. 1 (Cal.).

An allowance paid by the Court of Wards to the grandson (daughter's son) and prospective heir of a Hindu proprietrix of an estate is not an expenditure incurred by the Court of Wards on his maintenance but his income, Kedar Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1938 I.T.R. 157 (All.).

In taxing the executors of a will the cost of probate, etc., cannot be deducted from the taxable income even though the will expressly directs that the expenses shall be paid out of the income of the estate, so also, expenses on sradh and funeral ceremonies. These are not cases in which a portion of the income is by an overriding title diverted from the person who would otherwise have received it (as in Dudhuria's case) but of expenditure by persons who, having received the whole income, spend a part of it in accordance with the directions of the testator in whose shoes they stand. In re P. C. Mallick & Aich, 1936 I.T.R. 369, affirmed by the Privy Council in P. C. Mallick v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1938 I.T.R. 206 (P.C.).

"The payment of interest on estate duty was not an outgoing necessary for obtaining the income from investments. The interest on estate duty was not legally charged upon or payable out of the sum received for dividends but was payable out of any moneys in the hands of the appellants as trustees. . . .

Mr. M. . . . suggested. . . . that when a tax-payer collects an income and is subject to the obligation of diverting it into two streams, one of which stream is to flow into the coffers of a creditor, then he must be considered to have collected that part of his income for and on behalf of the creditor. . . . In my view the taxpayer in such a case collects the whole income for himself and then (if he is an honest man) pays his debts to his creditor", per Viscount Cave in Lord Inverclyde's Trustees v. Millar, (1924) A.C. 580; 9 Tax Cases 14.

A testator left an annuity for his widow, certain settled legacies and the residue to his sons. For convenience of administration, the trustees earmarked certain investments to meet the annuity and invested the estimated residuary funds separately for each account. When the income from the earmarked investments was not enough to pay the annuity the trustees first combined the incomes of the annuity and residuary funds but even this was not enough, and, rather than sell the corpus of the residuary funds in a depressed market, borrowed money on the security of these funds and paid the annuity. One of the sons claimed to reduce his income on the ground that the repayments of the loan were compulsory debts charged on his income. The claim was allowed by the High Court but disallowed by the Court of Appeal. The son was entitled only to what was left after the annuity; and the fact that the trustees had, for convenience of administration, earmarked funds for different purposes made no difference to the relative rights of the beneficiaries, Cowen v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 A.T.C. 1 (C.A.).

A mere covenant to pay a servant a salary would not make it the less the income of the master. Where, however, the payment is of such a nature that it has to be paid irrespective of whether the servant remains in the employer's service or not, e.g., a pension and is also charged on the payer's income, then it would not be his income but that of the payee, Duke of Westminster v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 19 Tax Cases 490; (1936) A.C. 1.

An assessee and his brother were partners in a business of which the property and goodwill had been bequeathed by their father's will upon trust for his two sons for life upon condition that they should enter into partnership. In order to preserve the assets of the business the trustees under the will compelled the partners to enter into an agreement under which a certain percentage of the net profit of the business was to be set aside in each half-year to create a reserve fund to meet any losses arising out of the business. Subject to this condition the reserve fund remained the property of the partners. Held, that the sum set aside was an annual payment reserved or charged upon the net profits of the partners whereby the income of each of the partners was diminished, Stocker v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1919) 2 K.B. 702; 7 Tax Cases 304.

"The income there, the Wemyss case supra, [8 Tax Cases 551; see notes under section 41] in question was not applicable for payment of a debt of the person to whom it otherwise would have belonged . . . the object of the destination of that part of the income was the increase of the settled funds."—Per Warrington, L.J., Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Paterson, (1924) 9 Tax Cases 163.

"The question is whether when a debtor buys a property with borrowed money and charges the proceeds of the property in favour of creditors to repay the debt, these proceeds are income of the debtor . . . and I may ask if they are not income of the debtor whose income are they? . . . If it is not the debtor's income it must be the creditor's income and I am not sufficiently topsy-turvy to think of a creditor discharging debts due to him out of his own income."—Per Scrutton, L.J., ibid.

"If a person has alienated his income so that it is no longer his income, he is not super-taxed on it, but if he merely applies the income so that it passes through him and goes on to an ulterior purpose, even although he may be obliged to do that, it still remains his income . . . the line is very hard to draw between what is an alienation and what is a binding application. From that point of view . . . it is very important to look and see what the purpose of the application is. Whether it is to pay a man's own debt or for some other purpose but . . . logically the purpose of an alienation, if it is an alienation, does not matter and the purpose of an application, if it is an application, does not matter . . .

The Wemyss case was clearly a case of alienation (In it) a man, resettling funds in which he had a reversionary interest, resettled them so as to exclude himself from the enjoyment of any part of the income the Court of Appeal held (in Paterson's case) that it was merely a case of a lady entering into an arrangement to apply her income to the satisfaction of a certain demand, which demand happened to be a debt owing by herself which perhaps made the consideration of the transaction easier, but which I do not believe can be a necessary circumstance."—Per Rowlatt, J., Perkins' Executor v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, (1928) 13 Tax Cases 851; 7 A.T.C. 183 (K.B.D.).

In the Wemyss Case, (1924) Sess. Cases 284; 8 Tax Cases 551, the surplus income belonged to the trustees, who paid the assessee's debts, while, in the Paterson case, 9 Tax Cases 163, the money was the debtor-assessee's own income and in the Perkins' Executor case, (1928) 13 Tax Cases 851; 7 A.T.C. 183 (K.B.D.), the wife was a part-owner of the income and the surplus was to pay debts on shares of which she had the equity of redemption.

Guaranteed profits.—Profits received by a company from an independent guarantor guaranteeing to the shareholders a certain dividend are not the profits of the company, the latter being merely the vehicle for handing over the guaranteed money to the shareholders, In re South Llanharan Colliery Co., 12 Ch. D. 503. But where there is no such outside guarantee profits received by a company in the course of its business even though held in trust for debenture-holders, etc., are profits of the company. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. City of Buenos Ayres Tramways, (1926) 12 Tax Cases 1125, 6 A.T.C. 195.

The subsidy paid by Government to a Railway Company in order to make up a guaranteed rate of interest on the capital of the company is the income of the company even though the guaranteed interest is payable to the shareholders. Such a subsidy is in lieu of monies which might have been earned by the company and is of the same nature as such monies; it is in the coffers of the company and is available in the same way as earnings for the payment of interest or dividend. Ahmedpur Katwa Railway v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, 1935 I.T.R. 277; 63 Cal. 109; 8 I.T.C. 280.

If a company A, guarantees the dividends of another Company B, the amount paid by A as guarantee to B is the income of the latter. The fact that the dividends are cumulative (preference) and that such guaranteed payments discharge a future liability of B will not make the guarantee payments any the less the income of B. Aeolian Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 20 Tax Cases 547; (1936) 2 All. E.R. 219.

Separated wife—Obligatory payments to.—Under an agreement between an assessee and his wife he had to pay her a weekly sum of £30 for her separate use during their joint lives. Held, that the payments could be deducted in computing the assessee's income for super-tax purposes.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"Although he is separated he cannot deduct it if he is separated not on the terms of paying the money, or if he is under no obligation to pay it, but merely sends it because he thinks it is the right thing to do, or, for some other reason, voluntarily sends it week by week. . . . If he had not paid I do not think he could have defended an action for a moment, if an action had been brought against him. He would have been beaten. . . . He went on paying the money because he was legally compelled to do so, and was under an obligation to do so. Therefore he is entitled to deduct it," Eadie v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1924) 2 K.B. 198; 9 Tax Cases 1.

Weekly payments to a wife under a Magistrate's maintenance order have been held to be "annual payments" liable to deduction of tax at source under Rule 19 of the U.K. General Rules, Clack v. Clack, 14 A.T.C. 250; (1935) 2 K.B.D. 109.

On the other hand, where the husband of a patient in a mental institution was appointed receiver of the latter's estate and undertook without legal obligation to make good out of his own money the difference between the wife's income and the cost of her maintenance, it was held that the husband could not deduct from his own income what he paid for his wife's maintenance. The ratio decidendi was that though the absence of a legal obligation did not make any material difference, the payments by the husband did not really form part of the wife's income, Watkins v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1939) 3 All.E.R. 165 K.B.D.

An allowance given under an order of a Court to a divorced wife for the maintenance of a minor child is not the income of the child but that of the mother. Stevens v. Tirard, 18 A.T.C. 305 (C.A.).

Lunacy percentage.—Lunacy percentage is a payment out of income of the lunatic after it becomes his income. Committee of A. B. v. Simpson, (1928) 14 Tax Cases 29; 7 A.T.C. 222; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sneath, 17 Tax Cases 149; (1932) 2 K.B. 362.

Legacy Duty paid by trustees.—An assessee was entitled under a will to a share of the net annual income of the testator's residuary estate. Legacy Duty was chargeable on the sums so payable from year to year, and was duly paid to the Crown by the trustees, who deducted it from their remittances to the assessee.

Held, that, although the trustees were primarily accountable for the Legacy Duty, it was, in effect, a personal obligation of the assessee, and that the income receivable under the bequest had been rightly included in the computation of his total income for the purposes of super-tax in the full amount of his share of the net residuary income, plus the income-tax applicable thereto, without deduction of the Legacy Duty paid by the trustees on his behalf, Colville v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 60 Sc.L.R. 226; 8 Tax Cases 442.

Payments free of tax—Wills—Marriage settlements—Other contracts.—Under the English law there is an express provision, Rule 23, General Rules (all schedules), declaring that "every agreement for payment of interest, rent, or other annual payment in full without allowing any such deduction shall be void". This has been construed to mean that the agreement would be void only as regards the particular stipulation for the payment without deduction, see Gaskell v. King, (1809) 11 East. 165; Wigg v. Shuttleworth, (1810) 13 East 87; Readshaw v. Balders, (1811) 4 Taunt 57; Fuller v. Abbott, (1811) 4 Taunt 105; Tinckler v. Prentice, (1812) 4 Taunt 549.

There is a very large number of English cases regarding the effect of provisions in wills, marriage settlements and other contracts that payments should be made 'free of income-tax'. The decisions are somewhat conflicting but the following general principles can be deduced. Unlike other duties income-tax is a personal tax, not a tax on an estate, see Lethbridge v. Thurlows, (1851) 15 Beav. 334 and Sadler v. Richards, (1858) 4 K. and J. 302. Therefore the courts have generally held that all payments under such provisions are taxable in the hands of the recipient (by deduction at source) but if there is clear indication that the object of the testator or other person making the contract was to make the payment free of income-tax the payment should be made free of such tax, see Turner v. Mullineux, (1861) 1 John and H. 334; Festing v. Taylor, (1862) 7 L.T. 429; Abadam v. Abadam, (1864) 33 Beav. 475. A direction in general words such as 'a clear annuity' (In re Loveless), or 'free of all duties' (In re Saillard), or clear of all taxes and deduction, Gleadow v. Leetham, (1882) 22 Ch. D. 269, is not enough; still less, if the words are "such sum as will bring the amount to £X per annum", In re Skinner; Milbourne v. Skinner, 1942 I.T.R. 82 (Sup.) Ch. D. I. there must be either express provision that the income-tax should be borne by the trustees and not by the legatee or provisions which will bear no doubt as to that having been the intention of the testator.

If a will directs the payment of an annuity or other sum free of income-tax the direction must be carried out, Lovat (Lord) v. Duchees of Leeds, (1862) 31 L.J.Ch. 503; 6 L.T. 307; 10 W.R. 397.

"It is simply a matter of construction . . . whether the testator has given the annuity together with a sum equal to the income-tax to the annuitant so that the annuitant may receive the annuity free of tax or has simply given an annuity and left the annuitant to bear his own income-tax." Per Swinfen Eady, L.J., in In re Sillard: Prath v. Gamble, (1917) 2 Ch. 401.

It was also held, in Festing v. Taylor, (1862) 3 B. & S. 217; 7 L.T. 429, that bequests free of income-tax were not void as wills had not been referred to in section 103 of the 1842 Act (corresponding to Rule 23, General Rules now) and the omission could not be accidental. This is due to the fact that under a will the parties "take their respective rights from the bounty or the forbearance of the testator". Even as regards non-testamentary payments it has sometimes been held that contracts to pay free of tax are not void, see Brooke v. Price, (1917) A.C. 115 (a settlement on dissolution of marriage); Beadel v. Pitt, (1865) 11 L.T. 592 (lease).

A bequest free of income-tax is not free of super-tax, see In re Crawshay: Grawshay v. Crawshay, (1915) W.N. 412; also In re Bates: Selmes v. Bates, 4 A.T.C. 518. Similarly 'free of all deductions including income-tax' has been held to exclude recoupment of super-tax, Prentices Trustees v. Pentice, 13 A.T.C. 612 (C.S.). See also Rowan's Trustees v. Rowan, (C.S.) 18 A.T.C. 378; In re Cowlshaw: Cowlshaw v. Cowlshaw, 18 A.T.C. 377, following In re Shrewsbury Estates Act, (1924) 1 Ch. 315.

The authorities were reviewed by the Court of Appeal in In re Reckett: Reckett v. Reckett, (1932) 2 Ch. 144; 1933 I.T.R. 1, and the conclusion reached was that close attention should be paid to the actual words used in the will. In the particular case, the relevant words used were "the annual sum of . . . free of income-tax", and it was held that the annuity should be paid free of sur-tax also, the latter being merely an additional duty of income-tax. In re Bates was distinguished on the ground that the words used by the testator in that case intended to confine the exemption only to income-tax proper.

Even if the words are clear that the bequest is to be 'free of tax', the reference can only be to the taxes in the testators country and not to foreign taxes unless the latter are specifically referred to. In re Frazer; Frazer v. Hughes, 1941 I.T.R. 137.

In considering these rulings it should be noted that under section 7 and 18 of the Indian Income-tax Act, it is only annuities that are paid by Government, etc., or a private employer that can be taxed at source. Annuities under wills can be taxed only under section 12, i.e., by the Income-tax Officer making an assessment on the annuitant; and his liability to tax will not be affected even though under the will he may be entitled to be reimbursed this tax from the estate, or if the payment is not under a will, from the person paying him the annuity.

So many complicated cases have arisen in the United Kingdom because under the law there the trustee is often taxed on the gross income and is authorised to recoup himself by deducting tax from the annuitant.

Where the tax is payable by the trustee, the share payable by him would ordinarily be the proportion of tax payable by the beneficiary equal to the proportion borne by the annuity (or other payment from the trust) plus tax thereon bears to the total income of the beneficiary, see Richmond's Trustees v. Richmond, 14 A.T.C. 500 (C.S.); (1935) S.C. 585 following Re Browning (an English Case), 34 T.L.R. 575.

Contracts—Free of tax.—Though there is no provision in the Indian Statute corresponding to Rule 23 of the English General Rules, section 23 of the Indian Contract Act provides that an agreement not to deduct tax where it has to be deducted is not enforceable. This, however, would not prevent a person so contracting as to pay the other party so much as would after deduction of tax leave him a specified net amount. That is, the consideration for the contract would be the gross amount, see North British Railway Co. v. Scott, 8 Tax Cases 332; (1923) A.C. 37 and Hartland v. Diggins, 10 Tax Cases 247; (1926) A.C. 289; South American Stores v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 905.

CAPITAL AND INCOME.

Till 1939 the tax was on all "income, profits and gains" and now it is on "total income." This does not, however, involve a change of substance and the tax is still on income, profits and gains (see section 6) and not on capital except to the extent included by the special definition in section 2 (6-C). Capital receipts would be exempt under section 4 (3) (vii) as they would ex hypothesi be casual and non-recurring; nor could they be "income, profits or gains" even if they arose out of business or the exercise of a profession, vocation or occupation.

Anything which can be properly described as income is taxable unless it is exempted, Kedar Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. (1938) I.T.R. 157 (All.).

In this respect, viz., that of taxing "income, profits and gains" and not 'capital' there was, no difference between the Indian law and the English till sub-section (6-C) was added to section 2 in the Indian Income-tax Act though the Calcutta High Court at one stage. (Turner Morrison's Case, 56 Cal. 211) was inclined to hold otherwise. See the decision of the Privy Council in Shaw Wallace's Case, A.I.R. 1932 P.C. 138; 59 I.A. 206. "Income-tax is a tax on income", per Lord Macnaghten—London County Council v. Attorney-General, 4 Tax Cases 265.

"I think it cannot be doubted upon the language and the whole purpose and meaning of the Income-tax Acts that it never was intended to tax capital as income at all events", per the Earl of Halsbury in Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, 4 Tax Cases 618; (1903) A.C. 299.

It has to be repeated, however, that the special definition in section 2 (6-C) inserted in 1939 makes an exception to these principles.

Similarly the law does not permit losses or expenditure of a capital nature to be deducted from taxable income or profits—see sections 9 to 13.

As to what constitutes the distinction between capital and income, it is almost impossible to give a satisfactory definition. As Pollock, M.R., said—

"What is capital and what is attributable to revenue-account I suppose is a puzzling question to many accountants and I do not suppose that it is possible to lay down any satisfactory definition", Atherton v. British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Ltd., 10 Tax Cases 155.

"Whether something is income or not is prima facie a question of fact and not of law, for after all, the distinction between income and capital is one of convenience and there is no real substance in it." Per the Lord President in I. D. Laird v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 A.T.C. 422; 14 Tax Cases 395.

Generally speaking, income cannot arise out of appreciation of fixed capital but only out of the turning over (or appreciation) of floating or circulating capital. There is no clear definition, however of what constitutes fixed or floating capital; and what is fixed capital in the hands of one person, e.g., spinning machines of a spinner, may be circulating capital in the hands of another, e.g., the same machinery in the hands of the manufacturer of the machinery.

Income.—"Income" signifies "what comes in", per Selborne, L.C.—Jones v. Ogle, 42 L.J. Ch. 336. "It is as large a word as can be used" to denote a person's receipts, per Jessel, M.R.—Re Huggins, 51 L.J.Ch. 938.

A person's "income"—even "total income from all sources", section 8, 39 & 40 Vict., c. 16,—means, money, or money's worth, received by him and (in this connection, at least) money's worth must be something that "can be turned into money", per Halsbury, L.C.—Tennant v. Smith, (1892) A.C. 150, the tax, whether under Schedule D or E is, "not on what saves a person's pocket but, on what goes into his pocket" (per Lord Macnaghten, Ib.). Therefore, an employee, though of so superior a character as a Bank Manager, who as part of the terms of his employment has to reside on his employer's premises, which residence he gets rent free but cannot sub-let or turn to pecuniary account, does not thereby get any addition to his income, any more than does the Master of a Ship who is spared the cost of house-rent while afloat, Tennant v. Smith, (1892) A.C. 150 (Stroud). But this decision does not apply in its entirety to India—see section 7.

As regards income in kind generally see notes under section 13.

"Profits" and "income" are sometimes used as synonyms; but, strictly speaking, "income" means that which comes in without reference to the outgoings; whilst "profits" generally means the gain which is made when both receipts and payments are taken into account, People v. Niagara Supervisors, 4 Hill 23. If properly used for creating new shares, they, i.e., profits, are "Capital," Bouch v. Sproule, 12 App. Cases 385; Sythe: Re Nothage, 63 L.J.Ch. 488; Vh, Re Paget, 9 Times Re. 88; Re Malam, (1894) 3 Ch. 578; Re Armitage, (1893) 3 Ch. 337. (Stroud.)

Decisions about "capital" and "income" under Companies Acts however cannot be applied in their entirety to Income-tax matters, though according to Lord Atkinson, Scottish North American Trust v. Fairner, (1912) A.C. 118; 5 Tax Cases 693, "there is nothing to show that that word should bear a different meaning in the Income-tax Acts (from that in the Companies Acts) when applied to the proceedings of Joint Stock Companies."

See also Fletcher Moulten, L.J., in In re Spanish Prospecting Co., Ltd., (1911) 1 Ch. 92. "The word 'profits' has in my opinion a well-defined legal meaning, and this meaning coincides with the fundamental conception of profits in general parlance, although in mercantile phraseology the word may at times bear meanings indicated by the special context which deviate in some respects from this fundamental signification. "Profits" implies comparison between the state of a business at two specific dates usually separated by an interval of a year. The fundamental meaning is the amount of gain made by the business during the year. This can only be ascertained by a comparison of the assets of the business at the two dates. For practical purposes, these assets in calculating profits must be valued and not merely enumerated. . . . A depreciation in value, whether from physical or commercial causes which affects their realizable value is in truth a business loss. . . . But though there is a wide field for variation of practice in these estimations of profits in the domestic documents of a firm or a company, this liberty ceases at once when the rights of third persons intervene. For instance, the revenue has a right to a certain percentage of the profits of a company by way of income-tax. The actual profit and loss accounts of the company do not in any way bind the Crown in arriving at the tax to be paid." This however, was a ruling under the Companies Act and not under Taxation Acts.

The question of applying the principle of the above ruling to taxation cases was examined and negatived by all the three Courts in Naval Colliery, Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 1017; 136 L.T. 28.

Gains.—"Although in the Income-tax Act, 1842 (Schedule D and section 100), 'profits' and 'gains' are really equivalent terms, yet the use of the word 'gains' in addition to the word 'profits' furnishes an additional argument for excluding the contention that you are to introduce into the word 'profits' some ideas connected, not with the nature of the thing but, with the manner and rule of its application. What are the 'gains' of a trade? If it could be reasonably contended that the word 'profits' in these (Income-tax) Acts, has reference to some advantage which the persons carrying on the concern are to derive from it, it might be said, perhaps, that the same argument might have been raised upon the word 'gains', but, to my mind, it is reasonably plain that the 'gains' of a trade are that which is gained by the trading, for whatever purpose it is used, whether it is gained for the benefit of a community or for the benefit of individuals", per the Lord Chancellor—Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas, 2 Tax Cases 25; 8 A.C. 891.

Income.—"Without giving an exhaustive definition it may be described as the annual or periodical yield in money or reducible to money value arising from the use of real or personal property or from labour or services rendered bearing in mind that in some cases, e.g., income derived from house property, the yield must be taken as the bona fide annual value and not necessarily as the actual yield", per Dawson Miller, C.J., in In re Raja Jyoti Prashad Singh Deo, 1 I.T.C. 103; A.I.R. 1921 Pat. 81; 58 I.C. 836.

"The word 'income' is not a term of art, and what forms of receipts are comprehended within it, and what principles are to be applied to ascertain how much of these receipts ought to be treated as income must be determined in accordance with the ordinary concepts and usages of mankind except in so far as the Statute states or indicates an intention that receipts which are not income in ordinary parlance are to be treated as income, or that special rules are to be applied for arriving at the taxable amount of receipts", per Jordan, C.J., in Scott v. Commissioners of Taxes (N.S.W.), 1935 S.R. (N.S.W.) 215; see also Attorney-General of British Columbia v. Ostrum, 1904 A.C. 147 and Lambe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Tax Cases 212.

"'Profits or gains' mean something which is in the nature of interest or fruit as opposed to principal or tree", per Rowlatt, J., in Ryall v. Hoare, (1923) 2 K.B. 447; 8 Tax Cases 521.

The expansion of "income" into "income, profits and gains", (as the section stood before 1939) is more a matter of words than of substance. Income in this Act according to the Privy Council, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Shaw Wallace & Co., 59 I.A. 206; see also Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal v. Mercantile Bank of India and others, 1936 I.T.R. 289 (P.C.); I.L.R. (1937) 1 Cal. 180, connotes a monetary return "coming in" with some sort of regularity or expected regularity from definite sources. The source need not be continuously productive but its object must be the production of a definite return—as distinguished from windfalls. Thus income has been likened practically to the fruit of a tree or the crop of a field. It is essentially the produce of something which is loosely spoken of as capital. But capital, though possibly the source in the case of income from securities, is in most cases hardly more than an element in the process of production. The use of the word "income" in section 4 (3) as comprehending, at first sight "capital" sums is merely due to the over-anxiety of the draftsman to make it clear—by explicitly putting in clause (v) of section 4 (3)—that the sums referred to in that clause which could not in any scheme of taxation be regarded as income, were exempt. Section 4 (3) therefore cannot be invoked to enlarge the meaning of the word "income" in section 3 so as to induce all kinds of receipts—irrespective of their nature—which have not been specially exempted.

Picturesque similes—like tree and fruit, however, cannot limit the true nature of income. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, 1943 I.T.R. 513 (P.C.) in which it was held that a royalty from a coal mine is income. Income is not necessarily the recurrent return from a definite source though it is generally of that character. Income may again consist of a series of separate receipts, as it generally does in the case of professional earnings. The multiplicity of forms which 'income' may assure is beyond enumeration. Generally however, the fact that income flows from some capital assets, of which the simplest illustration is the purchaser of an annuity for a lump sum, does not prevent it from being income, though in some analogous cases, the true view may be that the payments, though spread over a period are not income but instalments of purchase price payable at future specified dates.

".....the word 'income' is an expression of elastic ambit and Courts, when considering whether any particular sum can be said to be the income of (an) assessee have attempted either to bring it in, or to exclude it from, a certain description which they have chosen to give to the word 'income', but they have always qualified the said description by saying that it is not exhaustive", Kedar Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U. P., 1938 I.T.R. 157 (All.).

While when contrasted with capital, there is no difference inter se between "income", "profits" and "gains", an examination of sections 6 to 12 will show that "income" refers to a periodical return "coming in" and accruing to the recipient independently and not as the proceeds of a business or profession. In this view "income" connotes incoming without outgoing, while profits and gains are the surplus of the receipts from business, etc., over the expenditure necessary to earn them, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Bengalee Urban Co-operative Society, 1934 I.T.R. 127; cf. also People v. Niagara Supervisors, 4 Hill 23. 'Income' is not only more general than 'profit' or 'gain' but is often more appropriate, e.g., in respect of a mining lease, Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, 1940 I.T.R. 563; 1943 I.T.R. 513 (P.C.).

The words "profits and gains" are an amplification of the word "income" and not a limitation on it; all that is implied is that profits and gains are varieties of income, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa v. Gopalsaran, 1934 I.T.R. 267; 1935 I.T.R. 237 (P.C.). The words 'profits and gains' do not really add anything to the word 'income'. In re Laler Indra Sen, 1940 I.T.R. 187. According to another view the words are really used in a disjunctive sense, Kedar Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1938 I.T.R. 157 (All.).

All these dicta and rulings, however, must be read with reference to the special definition in section 2 (6-C) inserted in 1939 which deems certain capital sums to be income.

Burden of proof.—It is for the taxpayer, who seeks exemption to prove that a particular item of receipt is capital and not income. In re Indra Sen, 1940 I.T.R. 187.

U.S.A.—The distinction between "capital" and "income" is of importance under the taxation laws in the U.S.A. As one writer says:

"What is needed is an authoritative definition of 'income'. It cannot be found in the Supreme Court decisions because there are too many differentiations and limitations to make it at all clear what a decision will be in any future case." Another defines "income" as "the money value of the net accretion to one's economic power between two points of time." This of course will not fit in with the Indian or the English law neither of which taxes the appreciation of capital values—whether realised or not.

"The meaning of that word (income) is not to be found in its bare etymological derivation. Its meaning is rather to be gathered from the implicit assumptions of its use in common speech. The implied distinction, it seems to us, is between permanent sources of wealth and more or less periodic earnings. Of course the term is not limited to earnings from economic capital, i.e., wealth industrially employed in permanent form. It includes the earnings from a calling as well as interest, royalties or dividends . . . yet the word unquestionably imports, at least so it seems to us, the current distinction between what is commonly treated as the increase or increment from the exercise of some economically productive power of one sort or another and the power itself, and it should not include such wealth as is honestly appropriated to what would customarily be regarded as the capital of the corporation taxed", U. S. v. Oregon R. & Nev. Co., 251 Fed. 211.

In Macomber v. Eisner, 252 U. S. 189, Pitney, C.J., said "Enrichment through increase in value of capital investment is not income in any proper meaning of the term, that is, if unrealised by the persons who are taxed. Again, after examining dictionaries in common use (Bouye, L. D., Standard Dictionary, Webster's International Dictionary, Century Dictionary) we find little to add to the succinct definition adopted in two cases arising under the Corporation Tax Act of 1909, Stratton's Independence v. Howbert, 231 U.S. 399, 415: Doyle v. Mitchell Bros. Co., 247 U.S. 179, 185. 'Income may be defined as the gain derived from capital, from labour or from both combined' provided it be understood to include profit gained through a sale or conversion of capital assets to which it was applied in the Doyle case."

The decisions that have been set out below refer to capital receipts. The decisions about capital expenditure have been set out under section 10 (2) (xii) which prohibits the deduction of capital expenditure from taxable profits.

As regards Capital Receipts, see also the decisions that have been set out under "Business"—section 2 (4); 'Income'—section 2 (6-C): and Casual Receipts—section 4 (3) (vii). These subjects overlap each other.

Investments—Appreciation of.—"It is quite a well-settled principle in dealing with questions of assessment of income-tax, that where the owner of an ordinary investment chooses to realise it, and obtains a greater price for it than he originally acquired it, at the enhanced price is not profit assessable to income-tax. But it is equally well established that enhanced values obtained from realisation or conversion of securities may be so assessable, where what is done is not merely a realisation or change of investment, but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business. The simplest case is that of a person or association of persons buying and selling lands or securities speculatively, in order to make a gain, dealing in such investments as a business, and thereby seeking to make profits. There are many companies which in their very inception are formed for such a purpose, and in these cases it is not doubtful that, where they make a gain by a realisation, the gain they make is liable to be assessed for income-tax.

What is the line which separates the two classes of cases may be difficult to define, and each case must be considered according to its facts; the question to be determined being—is the sum of gain that has been made a mere enhancement of value by realising a security, or is it a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit-making?" Per Lord Justice Clerk in Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris, 5 Tax Cases 159; see also Northern Assurance Co. v. Russell, 2 Tax Cases 551; 26 Sc. L. R. 330.

An Investment Trust Company had powers in its Memorandum of Association to vary its investments and generally to sell or exchange any of its assets, held, that the net gain by realising investments at large prices, than were paid for them constituted profits chargeable with income-tax, Scottish Investment Trust Company v. Forbes, 3 Tax Cases 231; 31 Sc. L. R. 219.

Fer the Lord President.—"The varying the investments and turning them to account are not contemplated merely as proceedings incidentally necessary, for they take their place among what are the essential features of the business. . . . My view of this company is therefore that its position in the present question is entirely distinguished from that of a private individual or an ordinary trader. Accordingly I think that it is wrong in its contention that increases on realisation of stocks of the company are capital sums."

In Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Scottish Automobile & General Insurance Co., Ltd., 16 Tax Cases 381, it was held (Lord Morison dissenting) that there was evidence on which the Commissioners could find that profits from changing investments were of the nature of capital appreciation. The company did not deal in life insurance and the contracts were for one year only. The power to invest—which the company possessed—was only subsidiary to its business of insurance and the changes in investments were comparatively rare. The investments, moreover, were of surplus capital. See also Royal Insurance Co. v. Stephen, 14 Tax Cases 22; 44 T.L.R. 630 and Westminster Bank v. Osler, 17 Tax Cases 381; (1933) A. C. 139 referred to under section 13.

Whether profits or losses from investments should be included in the computation of taxable profits will depend on whether the investments are of the nature of stock-in-trade or of the nature of fixed capital, e.g. permanently excluding a certain sum from the floating capital and keeping it as an emergency reserve. The finding on this point would be one of fact, and one of the relevant considerations would be the intention of the assessee as to the object of the investment. Accordingly, when a produce exchange, which did business of a quasi-banking nature received large deposits from clients and invested them in securities and made profits on the sale of these securities and the Income-tax authorities assessed these profits the High Court declined to interfere, In re Amritsar Produce Exchange, Ltd., 1937 I.T.R. 307 (Lah.). So also in a case in which a Bank which held large blocks of securities as part of its general floating capital without earmarking any part thereof for the purpose of anything in the nature of fixed capital. The fact that profits from the sale of securities were taken, not to revenue Account but en bloc to a Reserve was not held to be conclusive; and it was held that the question whether profits arose from trading or from the appreciation of capital investments is always a question of fact to be determined by the Income-tax authorities, Punjab Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1938 I.T.R. 355; I.L.R. 1938 Lah. 526; A.I.R. 1938 Lah. 852.

In order to tax profits on the sale of investments, it is not necessary that the assessee should be carrying on a separate business of investment; it is sufficient if the buying and selling of investments is a part of some business or other. The appreciation of the investments of a Bank was therefore held to be taxable—Punjab Co-operative Bank v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1940 I.T.R. 635 (P.C.). The profit made by a company from its surplus funds by the purchase and sale of shares of a sister concern was held to be income and not of a capital nature, being profit arising from one of the objects of the memorandum of the company. Dalmia Cement v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1944 I. T. R. 50. Where a person with plenty of forward transactions in the Stock Exchange, also had two 'ready' transactions in each of which he bought large blocks of shares and sold them within three or four months, it was held that the profits from the 'ready' transactions were not appreciation of capital but taxable income, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Sir Homi Mehta, 1943 I.T.R. 142.

Treasury Bills—Appreciation of.—The National Provident Institution bought certain Treasury Bills, of which some were held by it until maturity, others were sold in open market during their currency and the remainder were converted into War Loan. Held, that the whole difference between the price paid for a Treasury Bill and the sum realised by the purchaser whether by holding the Bill until maturity or by selling it or converting it before maturity, represented a profit chargeable to income-tax and that no part of that profit was an accretion of capital; (2) that profits so made constituted income of the year in which it is received.

Per Lord Haldane.—“By a majority, Lord Justice Warrington dissenting, the Court of Appeal held that the whole of the difference between the amount contracted for and the amount received for a bill which was sold or converted into War Loan during its currency was not necessarily taxable as a profit on a discount. The difference did not necessarily represent only a profit by way of income but might in part represent an accretion to capital. Such an accretion might be due to the state of the money market and the rise or fall in the value of money and the rates of interest by which the price of the Treasury Bill might have been caused to rise or fall without strict correspondence with its progress towards maturity. The only amount to be taxed as profit on a discount in such a case was therefore the amount by which its value had increased merely by reason of its advance towards maturity. The assessment was therefore ordered to be remitted . . . for adjustment by elimination of the elements of profit due to accretion of capital on this principle.

My Lords, on the . . . question I am unable to agree with the view of the Court of Appeal. I see no answer to the argument as stated by Lord Justice Warrington [(1920) 3 K.B. 35, 55]. It is concise and I will adopt his words: ‘When a holder, whether the original purchaser or not, realizes during currency, he really receives a proportion of the total profits resulting from the fact that the bill was brought at a discount. It is true that that proportion may not bear an exact relation to the period of currency, but may be determined by variations in the value of money, in the public credit and so forth. But it seems to me that the total of the profits received by the various sellers after deducting losses, if any, cannot exceed the difference between the price originally paid and the sum receivable at maturity and that the considerations I have referred to merely affect the distribution of that difference between the various holders. Profits made by discounting bills seem to me to rest on the same footing and conversion into War Loan also. This last is simply a sale on certain terms fixed by the Government and investment of the proceeds.' My Lords, I do not think this reasoning is really answerable", (1921) 2 A.C. at p. 231-232.

Per Lord Sumner.—"It is to be remembered that this is a case of a company which carries on a business and employs its funds for and in that business. The case stated finds no fact to distinguish these transactions from any other business use of money. It is not the case, as to which I say nothing, of a private person who, not in the course of any business at all, realises an investment and comes well out of it. Similarly, I see no warrant for trying to discriminate between the capital used in the transaction and the income obtained from its use. The Statute says nothing about it. To discount a Bill, even a Treasury Bill, you must have money or money's worth, but whether an accountant would say that it came out of or should be debited to capital or income makes no difference to the fact of discounting. The excess of what is got back to-morrow over what is put in to-day is profit and it is but rarely that even an economist can tell what is appreciation of capital and what is not", The National Provident Institution v. Brown and The Provident Mutual Life Assurance Association v. Ogston, 8 Tax Cases 57; (1921) 2 A.C. 222, 256.

Realising assets.—A company, which was formed of solvent contributories of a Bank, acquired from the liquidators the outstanding assets of the Bank, including sums expected to be recovered from estates of contributories, paying therefor a sum sufficient to enable the liquidators to discharge the liabilities of the Bank. From time to time the company sold portions of these assets at prices exceeding the values at which they were estimated in the books of the liquidators. Held, that the case, as stated, did not contain materials for a decision whether profits liable to assessment to income-tax had been made. But the judgment set out general principles.

Per Lord Young.—" . . . Now, what about recoveries from debtors? The company took them over. I should say that I have really no doubt that any person, or any company, making a trade of purchasing and selling investment-, will be liable to income-tax upon any profit which is made by that trade. It is quite an intelligible business. . . . But it is another proposition altogether that, where there is not a trade, a gain or loss upon the purchase and re-sale of property comes within the meaning of the Income-tax Acts. Take even proper traders: if proper traders sell their old premises and buy new ones and sell the old premises at a higher price than they paid for them. . . . I should say it was a totally untenable proposition that anything in excess of what they had paid for the old premises . . . is income within the meaning of the Act. I do not think it is at all. It is no more so in the case of a trader's income than in the case of a private individual selling his house at more than he had paid for it. . . . They were not making a trade of buying and selling debts. . . . The proposition that where anybody purchases a doubtful debt, and makes more than he paid for it—one purchase, he not being a trader in that kind of thing—that that is income is, I think, a proposition which cannot be sustained. . . .", Assets Co., Ltd v. Forbes, 3 Tax Cases 542; 34 Sc.L.R. 486.

"Thus the profit realised in a sale of shares may be capital if the seller is an ordinary investor changing his securities but in some instances at any rate, it may be income if the seller of the shares is an investment or insurance company," Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Kamakshya Narain Singh, 1943 I.T.R. 513 (P.C.).

Property—Sale of—Receipts from.—A company formed for the purpose, inter alia, of acquiring and re-selling mining property, first acquired and worked various properties. After some time it re-sold the whole to a second company receiving payment in fully paid shares of the latter company. Held, that the difference between the purchase price and the value of the shares for which the property was exchanged was a profit assessable to income-tax. The company's contention was that the case was one of substitution of one kind of capital for another and that in any case no tax should be levied until the value of the shares had been realised in money. The Court held that the company was formed with the object of making profit from the sale of its property and that therefore the profits in question were liable, Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris, 5 Tax Cases 159. This case was cited with approval in Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, (1914) A.C. 1001.

A company was formed with the object of acquiring estates in the Malay Peninsula and developing them by planting and cultivating rubber trees. Power was taken in the Memorandum of Association to sell the property and such a sale was contemplated in the prospectus issued at the inception of the company. Two estates were purchased, but the original capital being insufficient to develop them the whole of the undertaking was sold to a second company for a consideration (mainly in shares of the second company) in excess of the capital expended. At the date of the sale a considerable acreage had been planted, but no rubber had yet been produced or sold. Held, that the profit on the sale was not a profit assessable to income-tax but was an appreciation of capital.

Per Lord Salvesen.—The only difficulty arises from the decision in the Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris, 5 Tax Cases 159. This case was cited with approval in Commissioners of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, (1914) A.C. 1001. The facts in that case were not unlike those which occur here; but the grounds of the decision appear to me not to be applicable. Lord Trayner said (in that case).—"I am satisfied the appellant company was formed in order to acquire certain mineral fields or workings—not to work the same themselves for the benefit of the company but solely with the view and purpose of re-selling the same at a profit", Tebrau (Johore) Rubber Syndicate, Limited (in Liquidation) v. Farmer, 5 Tax Cases 658; (1910) Sess. Cases 906; 47 Sc.L.R. 816.

The Hudson Bay Company established by Charter were the owners of large territories in Rupert's Land, North America. In 1869 they surrendered to the Crown their territory and rights of government in exchange, inter alia, for a money payment and for a right to claim, within fifty years, a twentieth share in certain lands in the territory as from time to time the lands were settled. The lands granted to the company in pursuance of this agreement were sold by the company from time to time and the proceeds applied partly in payment of dividends and partly in reduction of capital. Held, that the proceeds of the sales of the lands so granted were not profits or gains derived by the company from carrying on a trade of dealing in land, and were not assessable to income-tax.

Per the Master of Rolls.—"The real question is whether this money can be regarded as profits or gains derived by the company from carrying on a trade or business. In my opinion it cannot. The company are doing no more than an ordinary landowner does who is minded to sell from time to time, as purchasers offer, portions suitable for building of an estate which has devolved upon him from his ancestors. I am unable to attach any weight to the circumstance that large sales are made every year. This is not a case where land is from time to time purchased with a view to re-sale; the company are only getting rid by sale, as fast as they reasonably can, of land which they acquired as part of a consideration for the surrender of their Charter."

Per Farwell, L.J.—"It is clear that a man who sells his land, or pictures, or jewels, is not chargeable with income-tax on the purchase-money or on the difference between the amount that he gave and the amount that he received for them. But if instead of dealing with his property as owner he embarks on a trade in which he uses that property for the purposes of his trade, then he becomes liable to pay, not on the excess of sale prices over purchase prices, but on the annual profits or gains arising from such trade, in ascertaining which those prices will no doubt come into consideration. . . . A landowner in England may establish a game farm on part of his estate, and make profits thereby which would be liable to income-tax, and he may also sell parts of his estate for building purposes, but his trade as a game farmer does not bring his sales as a landowner within the Income-tax Acts; and I see no difference in this respect between his position and that of the company. Again, a landowner may lay out part of his estate with roads and sewers, and sell it in lots for building, but he does this as owner, not as a land speculator. . . . Landowning is not a trade. . . .", Hudson Bay Coy., Ltd. v. Stevens, 5 Tax Cases 424; 25 T.L.R. 709.

A company was incorporated in 1904 with the primary object of acquiring, managing and developing with a view to ultimate sale, certain lands which were held in trust for various persons who were interested therein either as owners, joint owners or as trustees. Subject to an extraordinary resolution, the company had power to deal in other lands, but it had not at any time exercised that power. The share capital of the company was fixed at a nominal amount, solely to facilitate division among the beneficiaries, and was not determined by reference to the value of the lands acquired. All the ordinary shares had been allotted in consideration of the conveyance of the lands to the company, and these shares had been continuously held by the original allottees, or their representatives. Working capital had been provided by the issue to ordinary shareholders of preference shares for cash. In 1908 the company created and allotted to persons other than the ordinary shareholders deferred shares in return for services which enhanced the value of the lands. Held, that the surplus arising from the sale by the company of portions of the lands was not the profits of a trade or business, and, that the function of the company was merely to realise the capital value of the respective interests in the land under the trust.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"In this case the question is whether the company which was formed for what I may call family reasons is liable for income-tax on what it makes by selling the lands. Now the question is whether the company has really only realised some property held as capital by those who became its shareholders, namely, the people entitled under the trust or who started or founded the trust or whether it has got to the point of embarking in a trade or business of which these receipts are the resulting profits. . . . Now the company proceeded in a very enterprising way undoubtedly. It cleared the land and formed roads. It sold parts of it and kept some of the money and put it back into the land and so on, and it gave a share in its capital to certain people who were instrumental in bringing a railway there. Undoubtedly it has done very well. Under these circumstances the Attorney-General and the Revenue contend that it has gone beyond the stage of merely realising the property and has embarked upon a business in land which it has not in the real sense bought but in land which came to it. The Commissioners have held that it is not so and I am not prepared to differ from the Commissioners. If this had been an individual, he need not have had a company, he might have done all these things and if he had been a prudent or a public spirited man, he would have done all these things. If a landowner finding his property appreciating in value sells part of it and uses part of his money still further to develop the remaining parts, and so on he is not carrying on trade or business, he is only properly developing and realising his land", C. H. Rand v. The Alberni Land Coy., Ltd., 7 Tax Cases 629.

A company was incorporated with the primary object of acquiring, developing and turning to account certain concessions in German South-West Africa which included, (i) mineral rights, (ii) railway rights, and (iii) the right to the freehold of some 3,000,000 acres of land to be selected by the company. The company had power under the concession to transfer any or all of its rights to other persons or companies, and in particular had the right to turn the land granted to it to any account it might think most beneficial for its interests, though it was understood between the company and the German Government that the colonization of the country should be encouraged by the sale of land to settlers. From time to time throughout the life of the company sales of land were made to settlers and considerable tracts were also sold to other companies. The proceeds of the land sales were always carried to capital account, but the profits made on the sale of shares received from one of the companies in consideration of land transferred to it was distributed by way of dividend. Apart from the acquisition of the original concession, the company never purchased for itself any land or land rights. Held, that the profits derived by the company from sales of land were not of a capital nature and should be taken into account in computing for income-tax purposes the profits arising from the trade, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade exercised by the company.

"The question that we have to determine is whether the moneys derived from these sales of land fall into income or are to be treated as capital of the company. . . . The conclusion that I come to on reading the documents presented to us is this—that there is no definite segregation of the moneys received from the sales of land for the purpose of capital. . . . In Hudson's Bay Coy. v. Stevens, 5 Tax Cases 424 what . . . is decided by the Court is this, that inasmuch as the Commissioners found the facts and had drawn the inference negating the fact that the company were carrying on a trade in buying and selling land, therefore they were not liable to income-tax for such profits or gains by the sale of land; they are not derived by trading or carrying on business but by the sale of an old possession", Pollock, M.R.—Thew v. South-West Africa Company, Ltd., 9 Tax Cases 141; 131 L.T. 248.

In The Alabama Coal, Iron, Land and Colonization Co., Ltd. v. Mylam, 11 Tax Cases 232, the facts were as follows: In 1870 the State of Alabama raised a loan for the purpose of constructing a railway. In 1876 the State defaulted and transferred to certain trustees for the benefit of bondholders certain lands. The trustees were to sell the property, pay 10 per cent. of the proceeds to the State till the State had received all interest paid by it on the bonds before the default, and to distribute the balance amongst the bondholders. At the end of 10 years all bonds not presented or surrendered were to be barred from the benefits of the trust and to carry no claims against the State. A Company was formed with the object of putting into a marketable form the interests of the bondholders who had surrendered the bonds. The capital of the Company was 10,000 Preferred A Shares of £10 each, to be subscribed at par, and 26,000 Deferred B shares of £1 each to be issued fully paid, two B Shares being given as bonus on each A share subscribed for. The bondholders were given the first option of subscribing for the preferred Shares and they were also given the choice of surrendering to the Company their interest in exchange for non-interest-bearing Instalment Certificates equal to the amount of the bond plus accrued interest thereon plus three B shares for each bond. Of the original issued capital 56 per cent. belonged to bondholders and 44 per cent. to others. After paying off the State, 70 per cent. of the net proceeds from the sale of lands was applied in paying off the Instalment Certificates and 30 per cent. in paying dividends on A Shares and redeeming them at par. By 1886 the State had been fully paid off. The interests of all bondholders except those who had not surrendered the bonds within the 10 years' limit had also been acquired by the Company. Also an American Company had been formed to hold the trust lands in place of the trustees whose term had expired and the whole of the shares in this American Company had been allotted to the assessee Company. The assessee Company purchased certain other lands to develop the trust property. In 1904 all the Preferred Shares had been paid off and by 1912 two-thirds of all the Instalment Certificates had been repaid. In that year, however, further Deferred Shares were issued and the capital thus raised was used in paying off the bulk of the remaining Instalment Certificates. Held, that the Company was carrying on a trade. (The Hudson Bay Co., Ltd. v. Stevens, 5 Tax Cases 424; 25 T.L.R. 709 and Rand v. The Alberni Land Company, Ltd., 7 Tax Cases 629 distinguished.)

Per Rowlatt, J.—"There were these lands in the hands of the bondholders, it is not as if a band of speculators outside the bondholders had come and bought these lands . . . the bondholders themselves as individuals said: " . . . let us take these lands from the body which we are, and we can get some other people to come in with us . . . we ourselves can put up some more money, and we will take these lands, and give for them certain preferential rights, . . . We will not launch out widely . . . but we will launch out. We will embed the realization of these lands in an undertaking, which must be wider than the bare realization, with the minimum of nursing and the minimum of necessary expenditure which a landowner himself might be inclined to indulge in", The Alabama Coal, Iron, Land and Colonization Co., Ltd. v. Mylam, 11 Tax Cases 232.

In a case in which all that appeared in the books of a money-lender were entries to the effect that he had purchased a property in 1919 and again another in 1924 and that they were both sold in 1926-27 and there was nothing in the accounts or other documents to show that the income derived from these properties and the expenses incurred on them were included in and made part of the accounts of the money-lending business, the Income-tax Officer treated the difference between the cost and sale prices as a business profit acting on the general presumption that money-lenders of the particular class generally buy and sell such properties in the course of their business. The Madras High Court held that there was no evidence to justify the findings of the Income-tax Officer, R. M. V. R. M. Virappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 123; 4 I.T.C. 204.

On the other hand profits arising from the sale of land taken over in satisfaction of debts are profits from business if the creditor's business is that of lending money on the mortgage of land. The business is analogous to that of pawn-broking, S. L. S. Chettiappa Chettiar and S. L. Rm. Ramasami Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 119; 31 L.W. 215; 4 I.T.C. 188.

Where property is bought by a banker or money-lender from a debtor, in discharge of a loan, with the object of reselling it at a profit as soon as a suitable opportunity arises, the profit that arises is not a capital appreciation but income, In re Amritsar Produce Exchange, Ltd., (1937) I.T.R. 307; 18 Lah. 706; A.I.R. 1938 Lah. 44.

A money-lender received in settlement of an account the right to certain simple debts, to certain mortgage debts and a rubber plantation. The plantation was subsequently sold at a profit, and the question arose whether the profit was or was not casual. Having regard to the facts of the case, viz., all the accounts being kept together, the loss under the simple and mortgage debts being claimed as a business loss, the debit of the maintenance expenses of the plantation to the business account and the credit of income from the plantation to the business account, it was held that there was evidence to justify the finding of the Department that the income arose from business, and that the profit was not a capital appreciation, O. R. M. O. M. S. P. Lakshmanan Chetty v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 121; 4 I.T.C. 200.

Whether you are trading or realising a capital accretion is a question of fact. Even though a company may under its articles of association be empowered, inter alia, to trade in a particular manner, there is no natural presumption that it is doing so; and every transaction must be examined on its merits with a view to deciding whether it is trade or only the realisation of capital, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Hyndland Investment Co., 8 A.T.C. 378; 14 Tax Cases 694.

A builder and an architect formed an ad hoc partnership and bought certain blocks of land, which they "feued" to a private company under their control, the latter building houses on the lands and selling the houses to the public. The transactions were all bona fide; and the question arose whether the partnership carried on a trade in buying the lands and 'feuing' them to the company. On the facts, the Commissioners answered the question in the negative, and the Court declined to interfere, Inland Revenue v. Dean Property Co., 18 A.T.C. 219 (C.S.).

An association was formed under arrangements between the British and Australasian Governments to realise the value of surplus wool acquired during the Great War. Trade was not the object of the association and neither the wool nor the money realised was used for trading purposes. The Privy Council held accordingly that the wool was so to speak the "fixed" capital of the association, Taxes Commissioners v. British Australasian Wool Realisation Association, 9 A.T.C. 449; (1931) A.C. 224.

A company managing, developing and dealing in real property got an option to purchase land, and some years later, agreed with another party to form a company for developing a part of the land. Later on the shares of the company in the new company were sold to a third party. It was held that the sale proceeds of the shares were trading receipts of the old company, since the capital of the new company was in effect the stock in trade of the old company, Associated London Properties v. Henriksen, 1944 (C.A.).

Securities—Sale of—Surplus—When taxable.—Per Lord Dunedin in Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, (1914) A.C. 1001. . . .
 . . . "In the present case the whole object of the company was to hold and nurse the securities it held, and to sell them at a profit when convenient occasion presented itself.

"Their Lordships therefore come to the conclusion that there is ample evidence here that the company is a trading company and that the surplus realized by it by selling the assets at enhanced prices is a surplus which is taxable as profit. . . ."

Interest.—The difference between what a person receives and what he lends is not necessarily income. The first thing is to look at the contract. If the rate of interest is reasonable, having regard to all relevant circumstances, e.g., the market rate, the duration of the loan and the nature of the risk, the discount or premium—as the case may be—on the loan, whether on issue or on redemption is not of the nature of interest. A good example is a contract for repayment on a gold standard basis, involving heavy discounts and premia, which clearly are not interest. The question always is one of fact to be determined by the Revenue authorities. Where, however, no interest as such is charged the discount or premium will prima facie be of the nature of interest or revenue loss. In a case, therefore, in which a British newsprint company had advanced money to a foreign wood-pulp company (in which it was wholly interested beneficially) and the advances were funded into notes (debentures) issued at a discount and redeemable over a long period, carrying interest and also a premium on redemption, it was held that the difference between the issue price and the redemption price was not income but capital, Lomax v. Peter Dixon & Co., 25 Tax Cas. 353; 1924 I.T.R. (Sup.) 1.

The Hudson's Bay Company owned large tracts of land in Canada and from time to time sold plots or blocks of land to purchasers desiring to take up and occupy land for settlement in that country. The company entered into agreements with purchasers unable to provide the whole purchase-money in one sum, under which the purchaser paid a certain sum down when the contract was signed and the balance by equal annual instalments, each with interest calculated on the balance of the purchase-money remaining unpaid. The company agreed on completion of payment of the purchase-money and interest to convey the land to the purchaser, and meanwhile permitted the purchaser to occupy the land until default be made in payment of the sums of money agreed upon, in which case it reserved the right to cancel and determine the agreement and to re-enter upon or to resell the lands, all payments therefor made on account being forfeited to the company. Held, that the interest on unpaid purchase-money was income as the interest was income arising from a security and not capital, Hudson's Bay Co. v. Thew, 7 Tax Cases 206; (1919) 2 K.B. 632.

Coal bings—Slag, Sale of—Receipts from.—Certain bings of colliery dross which had been lying on an estate for many years were disposed of by the landowner to various parties who contracted to remove the whole of the dross within a limited period (3½ months). Held, that the payments were capital receipts and not profits.

Per Lord Cullen.—"It is not suggested that Lord Belhaven traded in bings; . . . the transaction was a contract of sale of the contents of a capital asset consisting of the bing and the price received . . . represented merely a change in the form of . . . capital", Roberts v. Lord Belhaven's Executors, 9 Tax Cases 501; (1925) Sc. L.T. 466.

A firm of iron-masters and coal-masters closed down business but the partnership was not dissolved, and the properties were conveyed to trustees to sell or hold in trust for the firm. One of the properties had a heap of slag which, at the time, was valueless but, some years later, was sold as roadmaking material to a company which was given the exclusive right to remove the slag on a royalty basis. It was held that no trade was being carried on and that the royalties were therefore not taxable, Shingler v. Williams and Sons, 17 Tax Cases 574 (K.B.D.); 49 T.L.R. 221.

A company—of iron-masters and coal-miners—took over from another Iron and Coal Company, inter alia certain heaps of slag as part of the undertaking. The iron and steel operations, barring one blast furnace, were given up after a few years during which period the slag was added to. Later on, the remaining furnace also was closed and the company confined itself to coal. Still later, slag, which previously had no value, found a market in road making and the question arose whether the sale proceeds of slag were capital or income. The Commissioners held that they were income and the Court declined to interfere, Beams v. Weardale Steel Coal and Coke Co., Ltd., 16 A.T.C. 158.

Premium—Mining Lease—Rent—Royalty.—"Salami" or premium paid at the beginning of a mining lease for a long period represents the purchase price of an out-and-out sale of the property and the sum received is 'capital' and not 'income'. But 'rent' or 'royalty' paid periodically is income, Raja Shiva Prasad Singh v. Rex, 1 I.T.C. 384; 4 Patna 73; A.I.R. 1924 Pat. 679; Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Kamakshya Narayan Singh, 1943 I.T.R. 513 (P.C.).

See also dicta in In re Gooptu Estates, Ltd., A.I.R. 1930 Cal. 1; 57 Cal. 910; 4 I.T.C. 146. If the letting out of property upon lease for premium and for rent is the business of an assessee, then the premium will be assessable as income either under section 10 or under section 12. But when a premium is received merely as an incident in the possession of property (even if leasehold) and there is no finding that letting out property is the business of the assessee, the premium received is capital.

Where, under a lease for an indefinite period, which was expressly made to be binding on the successors both of the lessor and of the lessee, the lessor had power to increase the rent, and to eject the lessee if in arrears, and a premium was received in addition to the recurring annual rent, it was held that the lease was permanent and that the premium was capital, Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O. v. Visheshwar Singh, 1939 I.T.R. 536. Whether Salami or Nazarana in respect of a lease is capital or income depends on the facts of the case, viz., whether in truth it is payment of rent in advance or a lump sum payment for the transfer of the leasehold, Rani Bhubaneswari v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1940 I.T.R. 550. Prima facie, however, it is not income; and it is for the taxing authorities to show that it is income, if they seek to tax it, Bihar v. Pratap Udainath, 1941 I.T.R. 313.

Two brothers following a partnership sold a cotton ginning business of theirs to a private company belonging, in substance, to them. They had been ginning cotton for a public company (under their management and influence) and the new private company in return for a ten-year contract agreeing to gin for the public company at lower rates, received 20,000 shares of the public company which in turn also received 1,000 shares of the private company. The Income-tax Officer treated these 1,000 shares as capital but assessed the private company on the market value of the 20,000 shares of the public company as income, being in essence an advance receipt of profits over the ten years. The High Court upheld the assessment, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. A. & F. Harvey, 1940 I.T.R. 307.

Business closing down—Sale of stock.—Whether the realisation of the value of stock of a business which is closed down is a capital receipt or a profit depends on the answer to the question—when does a business which is being closed down cease to be a business which is being carried on? That is, it is a question of fact.

Per Lord Atkinson.—"A trader who wishes to retire from business may wind up his business in several ways; he may sell his concern as a going concern, or he may auction off his stock. But there is another way quite as effectual, and that is by continuing to carry on his business in the ordinary way, but not replenishing his stock which he has accumulated as it is sold. Then he will leave himself with no stock, and, therefore, he can retire from business. But the fact that he realises stock in the process of carrying on the trade as he has hitherto done will effectuate both purposes", see J. and R. O'Kane and Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 303; 126 L.T. 707.

See also Doughty v. Commissioner of Taxes (a Colonial case), (1927) A.C. 327; 43 T.L.R. 207.

"Income-tax being a tax upon income, it is well established that the sale of a whole concern which can be shown to be a sale at a profit as compared with the price given for the business, or at which it stands in the books, does not give rise to a profit taxable to income-tax. It is easy enough to follow out this doctrine, where the business is one wholly or largely of production. . . . Where however a business consists as in the present case entirely in buying and selling, it is more difficult to distinguish between an ordinary and a realisation sale, the object of either case being to dispose of goods at a higher price than that given for them. . . . The fact that large blocks of stock are sold does not render the profits obtained anything different in kind from the profit obtained by a series of gradual and smaller sales. This might even be the case if the whole stock was sold out in one sale. Even in the case of a realisation sale, if there were an item which could be traced as representing the stock sold, the profit obtained by that sale, though made in conjunction with a sale of the whole concern, might conceivably be treated as taxable income"—Lord Phillimore in Doughty v. Commissioner of Taxes, (1927) A.C. 327, 331.

A realisation sale of stock-in-trade belonging to a trader need not necessarily be a sale in the course of trade irrespective of circumstances. If it were, cases like those of O'Kane & Co., 12 Tax Cas. 303; Edwards v. Old Bushmill Distillers, 10 Tax Cas. 285; Inland Revenue v. Ibid., 12 Tax Cas. 1148; and Hillerns and Fowler v. Murray, 17 Tax Cas. 77, would all have been decided more easily. In the last case, for example, there would have been no need for the Court to send the case back to the Commissioners for a specific finding as to whether the assessee was trading at the time of sale of stock. So, where a whisky broker with large stocks bought at low prices decided to retire on account of ill health compelling his absence from the business, and sold his assets after some time, viz., his stock, trade-name, furniture and fittings, at a heavy profit, and the Commissioners held that he had ceased to trade long before the sale, the Court declined to interfere, Inland Revenue v. William Nelson, 18 A.T.C. 237 (C.S.).

Mr. C. sold his business as a going concern to a company but subject inter alia to two conditions: (1) the profits on unexecuted contracts on the date of sale were to belong to the vendor, but the company was to execute the contracts and receive 25 per cent. of the profits on them, the balance of 75 per cent. being given to the vendor; and (2) the company was to collect outstanding debts on behalf of the vendor to whom they were to belong. It was held that the 75 per cent. given to the vendor was not a capital receipt but the profits of a new business set up at the time of sale, Southern v. Cohen's Executors, 1942 I.T.R. (Sup.) 8.

See also Martin v. Lowry, 11 Tax Cases 297; (1927) A.C. 312; Cohan's Executors v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 602 and Hillerns and Fowler v. Murray, (1932) 48 T.L.R. 213; 17 Tax Cases 77 (C.A.) referred to under sections 2 (4) and 4 (3) (vii).

Lease—Foreclosure of—Compensation paid.—The compensation paid to a lessee of mineral rights for compelling him to foreclose his lease is a capital receipt. The fact that compensation is based on the value of the minerals left unworked does not make the payment one of an accumulated loss of profits.

Per Lord Buckmaster.—"There is no relation between the measure that is used for the purpose of calculating a particular result and the quality of the figure that is arrived at by means of the application of that test. I am unable to regard this sum of money as anything but capital."

Per Lord Wrenbury.—"Is a sum profit which is paid to an owner of property on the terms that he shall not use his property so as to make a profit? The answer must be in the negative. The whole point is that he is not to make a profit and is paid for abstaining from seeking to make a profit . . . The matter may be regarded from another point of view—the right to work the area in which the working was to be abandoned was part of the capital asset consisting of the right to the whole area demised. Had the abandonment extended to the whole area, it would be impossible to contend that the compensation would be other than capital. It was the price paid for sterilising the assets from which otherwise profits might have been obtained. What is true of the whole must be equally true of part", Glenboig Union Fireclay Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 427; (1922) Sess. Cases (H.L.) 112.

This principle was also followed in Guinness & Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 3 A.T.C. 686; (1923) 2 I.R. 186 in which the firm who were brewers and whose stock of barley was commandeered by the Crown during the War claimed that the profits made on the compulsory sale to Government were not assessable to tax on the ground that they were not income but capital receipts. The Irish Court of Appeal upheld the contention (Pim. J., dissenting). Pim J.'s point was that the barley was part of the circulating capital of the company, not its fixed capital and that, therefore, the case was more like that of Beynon v. Ogg, 7 Tax Cases 125 than like the Glenboig case, supra.

In Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Newcastle Breweries, 12 Tax Cases 927, however, in which the greater part of the rum imported by the firm for blending purposes had been similarly commandeered by the Admiralty it was held by Rowlatt, J., that the compensation paid was a profit arising from the firm's trade. The decision of the Irish Court in the Guinness case was deliberately departed from. The reasoning of Rowlatt, J., was that in a case like the Glenboig case what was done was to stop the trade and pay compensation whereas in the Sutherland case, 12 Tax Cases 63 and the one before him all that happened was a compulsory sale of a portion of the goods and that the fact that the sale was compulsory could not make any difference. The Court of Appeal confirmed Rowlatt J.'s judgment. The House of Lords confirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal but considered the Guinness case distinguishable. In the Newcastle Brewery case, the initial payment which was made was received under protest later on, an Indemnity Act was passed, and a new Tribunal was set up to determine the additional compensation in cases of commanding for the war. The claim of the assessee was that as a consequence a new source of profit had arisen, whereas the decision was that the profit arose from the taking of the sum.

In the Sutherland case, the Admiralty had compulsorily hired a steam drifter of the assessee, and it was held that the payments by the Admiralty were not compensation for the stoppage of business but trading receipts since the assessee continued in his business of using the ship for profit. The ship had been acquired as a commercial asset. It could be put to a variety of profit-earning uses, and to whichever of these uses it may have been put, the business was the same, viz., making profits from the ship, so long as the ship was suited to the use, and even though alterations in the ship may have been necessary.

In Joglekar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Central Provinces, it has been held that if a person deals in lands as a business, the fact that, at one stage, the lands or a part thereof are compulsorily acquired by Government, will not make the gains from such sale any the less profits from business.

Payments made by a mine to the surface owner for the right to let down the surface may in certain circumstances be of the nature of rent, i.e., income and therefore taxable to the extent that it is held not to be agricultural, see Elliott v. Burn, (1935) A.C. 84; 18 Tax Cases 595; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. New Sharlston Collieries, (1936) 53 T.L.R. 280; 15 A.T.C. 578 (C.A.); Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sir Archibald Hope, 16 A.T.C. 78 (K.B.); Cf. also O'Grady v. Bullcroft Main Collieries and Markhan Main Collieries, 17 Tax Cases 93, [referred to under s. 10 (2) (xii)].

Forests—Felling timber—Receipts from.—The Allahabad High Court thought in the Tehri case, (1930) A.L.J. 579, that it was a question of fact whether receipts from timber sold in forests constituted capital or income. On the other hand it was held by the Madras High Court that such receipts are income, there being no essential difference between these receipts and those from quarries and mines all of which are treated as income, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Manaved Tirmalpad, 4 I.T.C. 421; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 764. A similar view was taken by the Oudh Chief Court in Maharaja of Kapinthal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1945 I.T.R. 74. If, however, the forest was felled once for all in a particular year or if the forest was sold outright, the owner not dealing in the purchase and sale of forests, the receipts might be capital.

Annuities—Repayment of debt.—The Secretary of State for India exercised the option of purchasing the undertaking of a railway company by payment of an annuity for a term of years instead of a lump sum. Held by the House of Lords, that income-tax could not be charged on the annuity.

Per Vaughan Williams, L.J.—"It is not denied, that the Income-tax Act would apply in respect of so much of each annual payment as was not a repayment of an instalment of the antecedent debt, and it is not denied in this case that income-tax is payable on so much of each annual instalment paid by the Secretary of State as consists of interest. The whole question is whether Income-tax is payable on that portion of the annual payment which can be discovered from the terms of the contract to be a payment of an instalment necessary to complete the payment of the existing debt. In my judgment no income-tax is payable in such case". (1903) 1 K.B. 494, 501.

Per Stirling, L.J.—"We have the authority of the decision in Nizam's Guaranteed State Railway Company v. Wyatt, 4 Tax Cases 621; 24 Q.B.D. 548, that the mere fact that a sum of money which is payable annually is designated as an annuity is not conclusive but that the real nature of the transaction must be looked at. If we look at the real nature of the transaction, these so-called annuities are simply annual payments of equal amount, being instalments of a debt, and are made up partly of principal, partly of interest, calculated at a particular rate. On the face of the contract, therefore, it appears that each annual instalment contains principal money and a portion of interest which can be readily ascertained by a competent actuary. It seems to me, therefore, that in that state of things we are right in following the principle which I take to be laid down in Foley v. Fletcher, 3 H. & N. 769, that the word "annuity", under those circumstances, is not to be read in such a way as to make capital taxable. . . . Now the difficulty which I certainly felt in the case arises from this: that it is said (and forcibly said) by the Attorney-General: "If that be so, then in the case of every terminable annuity which has been purchased for value the same thing occurs, and you ought, if you logically follow out the principle, to say that each annual payment of that annuity ought to be split up between capital and interest and the only portion which represents interest ought to be taxed." I feel the full force of that remark; but it seems to me that the cases are not the same. Those are cases of purchase of annuities, where investment has been made in that form of property, and the legislature in so many words has said that that is to be taxed; and it is recognised in this very case throughout that an annuity of the kind is taxable. And I in no way depart from that. The case to which I have referred seems to me to show that it is a different matter where it appears, on the face of the transaction, that the so-called annuity is not a thing of that kind, but simply represents instalments of an existing debt". (1903) 1 K.B. 494, 502.

Per Mathew, L.J.—"Annuity", in the ordinary sense of the expression, means the purchase of an income. 'It generally involves the conversion of capital into income, and reasonably enough, where the buyer places himself in that position, the Act of Parliament taxes him; he is taken at his word, he has got an income secured in the way I have mentioned. Now, has such a case any analogy whatever to the present? It appears to me, none. Here was a sum of money, a lump sum, stipulated for in the first instance, which was to represent the capital outlay. If that money had been handed over to those who were entitled to it, it might have been invested, ought to have been invested, and probably would have been invested, and, if invested, the income of it would be taxable and not the principal sum. Now that sum representing the capital outlay is by the terms of the contract a sum that may be paid off by what is called (unfortunately) in the contract an annuity. It really meant 'by annual instalments'." (1903) 1 K.B. 504.

Per the Lord Chancellor.—"Still, looking at the whole nature and substance of the transaction, I cannot doubt, I say, that what is called an 'annuity' in the contract between the parties and in the Statute was a mode of making the payment for that which, by the hypothesis on which I am speaking, had become a debt to be paid by the Government. If it was to be a debt paid by the Government, it introduces this consideration: was it the intention of the Income-tax Act ever to tax capital as if it was income? I think it cannot be doubted, both upon the language of the Act itself and the whole purport and meaning of the Income-tax Acts, that it never was intended to tax capital, as income at all events.

Under the circumstances, I think I am at liberty so far to analyse the nature of the transaction as to see whether this annual sum which is being paid is partly capital, or is to be treated simply as income, and I cannot disagree with what all the three learned Judges of the Court of Appeal pointed out, that you start upon the inquiry into this matter with the fact of an antecedent debt which has got to be paid; and if these sums, which it cannot be denied are partly in liquidation of that debt which is due are to be taxed as if they were income in each year in which it is being exacted, the result is that you are taxing part of the capital. As I have said, I do not think it was the intention of the Legislature to tax capital and, therefore, the claim as against those sums fails.

My Lords, as I have already said, I do not think it is a matter on which one can dogmatize very clearly. There is no doubt that what has been pointed out is true, that in one sense the Legislature has, in the sense in which I have used the words myself, taxed capital. Where you are dealing with income-tax upon a rent derived from coal, you are in truth taxing that which is capital in this sense, that it is a purchase of the coal and not a mere rent. All I have to say upon that and other illustrations of the same character is this, that the income-tax is not and cannot be, I suppose from the nature of things, cast upon absolutely logical lines," Secretary of State for India v. Scoble and others, 4 Tax Cases 618; (1903) A.C. 299, at p. 303.

Where, without any commercial background, or course of business, an assessee paid a large sum to a company and received in return 120 promissory notes of the company falling due for each quarter for thirty years, the lump sum paid being equivalent to the initial value of the notes on a 4 per cent. interest basis, it was held that each note should be dissected into capital and interest, the latter being taxed, Beck v. Lord Howard de Waldon, 23 Tax Cases 384.

Where an assessee transferred his estate to a relation on consideration of the latter's taking over the assessee's debts, paying some cash at once and also agreeing to pay an annuity for the rest of the assessee's life, it was held by the Patna High Court that the annuity was taxable as income, not being a repayment of capital. The assessee discarded his capital with its pleasures as well as its risks and burdens and chose to exchange for it the convenience of an annual income. In all such cases the substance and not the form of the transaction should be examined to ascertain the nature of the receipt, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa v. Gopal Sharan, (1934) I.T.R. 264; A.I.R. 1934 Pat. 384; 13 Patna 661. The Privy Council confirmed this ruling in (1935) I.T.R. 237; 62 I.A. 80; A.I.R. 1935 P.C. 143. To say that an annual instalment is a part of price does not necessarily make it a capital receipt. It is only one way of saying that it is consideration for transfer of property, and consideration may well take the form of annual sums which are income in the hands of the payee. The owner did not, in this case, exchange his estate for a capital sum payable in instalments but exchanged a capital estate for, inter alia, a life annuity; and the annuity was, therefore, taxable as income.

In consideration of a quarry owner's meeting the cost of constructing a siding to the quarry, a railway agreed to allow a rebate on freight on materials booked at the siding. The rebate was to last for ten years or till the cost of construction had been recouped whichever was earlier. It was held that the rebate was the income of the quarry since there was no overriding obligation as in Scoble's and similar cases for the repayment of a capital debt. Rebate on freight on materials debited to capital expenditure could however be excluded from the income. Westcombe v. Hadnock Quarries, Ltd., 16 Tax Cases 137.

A railway company constructed sidings for a customer who paid the cost of construction, but the railway was to eventually repurchase the sidings by paying to the customer every year a percentage of its own gross traffic receipts from the sidings, such payments ceasing when the cost of construction had been recouped when the sidings became the property of the railway. The agreement, however, could be terminated on 12 months' notice on either side irrespective of what had been repaid. The question arose whether the annual payments received by the customer from the railway were capital in his hands and was answered in the affirmative. Though there was no antecedent debt or a sale of sidings, the transaction was in substance one of sale and repurchase and the fact that the instalments of payments were measured with reference to the freight earned every year made no difference, Legge v. Flettons Limited, (1939) 3 All.E.R. 220, K.B.D.

A railway company possessing its own steel works agreed to close them down, (and not to permit them to be worked by others) for ten years during which period it was to take all its requirements of steel from two companies (of which the assessee was one). In return, the companies were inter alia, to pay £180,000 to the Railway Company in equal monthly instalments over the ten years. After sometime, the two steel companies farmed out a part of the contract—with the consent of the railway company—to outside manufacturers who were to take orders from, and supply directly to, the railway company, but were, all the same to pay so much per ton to the two companies. The tonnage so received was kept by the two companies in a special account and used for amortising the £180,000 which they were paying to the railway company. The Special Commissioners held that the tonnage receipts were trading receipts of the two companies but Macnaghten, J., overruled them. The Court of Appeal, however, agreed with them in holding that the tonnage was only a commission for procuring business, United Steel Companies v. Callington, 18 A.T.C. 311 (C.A.).

Annuities under education and endowment assurances in which the policy-holder receives back annuities for a given number of years depending on the survival of the nominee (usually a child) are not taxable in so far as the annuities represent repayment of premia paid but are taxable on the interest on such premia. In every case the taxability of an annuity depends on its true nature. There is no simple touch-stone to be applied, such as that there was or was not a pre-existing debt. It is immaterial whether the consideration is money paid or property assigned. An important test is whether you are parting with a capital sum or not. If the capital sum is returnable there can be no tax on its return, but when you purchase an annuity outright you practically sell a capital asset just as you would sell a patent or copyright in return for an annual royalty, The Right Rev. W. W. Perrin v. Dickson, 8 A.T.C. 153 and 372; 45 T.L.R. 621; (1930) 1 K.B. 107.

'Refund annuity' contracts provide not only for an annuity for life to the purchaser but also guarantee to pay his heir or nominee in annual or other instalments the difference between the purchase price and the total annuities drawn by the deceased. In such cases, what the heir receives is only a return of capital, and the absence of an antecedent debt makes no difference, Southern Smith v. Clancy, 1941 I.T.R. (Sup.) 10.

Payments under wills.—Annuities under wills are taxable even if paid out of capital funds but if an annuity is merely advanced and not paid finally, i.e., if it can be recovered as a debt, the annuity would be taxable only when finally paid or adjusted, but the question whether a payment is a loan or a payment in advance of the due date should be decided on the facts of each case, i.e., the proper construction of the trust or other provision regulating the payments, the nature of the discretion and powers of the trustees, etc., Williamson v. Ough, 20 Tax Cases 194; (1936) A.C. 384 (H.L.). In this case, payments out of capital in order to supplement the income were treated as the income of the recipients. An income receipt to the payee is not necessarily an income outgo of the payer or vice versa.

Broadly speaking, in the case of legacies and other payments under wills, if the capital belonged to the person receiving the sums, i.e., if he were beneficially interested not only in the income but in the corpus, then the payments would be regarded as paid out of capital but where there is a right only to income, and the corpus belongs to some one else, then the payments would be out of income, Brodies Trustees v. Inland Revenue, 17 Tax Cas. 432.

Merely calling something capital will not make it such. Where a testator directed trustees to "raise a clear sum of £250 free of all deductions. . . . out of the capital of the trust fund" and to pay that sum to each of his daughters and the residuary income to his widow, and the trustees sold some of the securities to raise the required amounts, it was held that what the daughters received was income, the true criterion being the nature of the receipt in the hands of the payee, Jackson's Trustees v. Inland Revenue, 1943 K.B.D. (?)

Royalties on minerals.—Per Mukerjee, J.—(After referring to Foley v. Fletcher, 3 H. & N. 769 and Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, (1903) A.C. 299; 4 Tax Cases 618). The term "income" is not defined in the Act (II of 1886). The word "income" however is, to use the language of Sir George Jessel in In re Huggins, (1882) 51 L.J. 935, 938 as large a word as can be used to denote a person's receipts, and it seems to me that it is wide enough to include a royalty received from a mine. The nature of a royalty was examined at some length by Lord Denman, C.J., in Reg. v. Westbrook and Reg. v. Everist, (1847) 10 Q.B. 178; 74 R.R. 248; it appears to have been contended in the case that it is altogether wrong in principle to consider the royalty as rent, because it is a sum paid not for the renewing produce of the land, but for severed portions of the land itself. The learned Chief Justice answered this argument by observing that the occupation of a mine is only valuable by removal of portions of the soil, and whether the occupation is paid for in money or in kind, is fixed beforehand by contract or measured afterwards by the actual produce, it is equally in substance a rent, inasmuch as it is the compensation, which the occupier pays the landlord for that species of occupation, which the contract between them allows. As pointed out by Lord Denman, this would not admit of an argument in an agricultural lease, where a tenant was to pay a certain portion of the produce, which would be admitted to be in all respects a rent service with every incident to such a rent. The same view was adopted in substance by Sir Charles Abbott, C.J., in King v. Alwood, (1827) 6 B. & C. 277 and by Lord Blackburn in Coltness Iron Company v. Black, (1861) 6 App. Cases 315, 335. Lord Blackburn referred to the observations of Lord Cairns in Gowan v. Christie, (1873) L.R. 2 H.L. (Sc.) 273 that a mineral lease, when properly considered, is in reality a sale out-and-out of a portion of the land, but remarked that this did not justify the inference, that no income-tax should be imposed on the rent reserved on a mineral lease. The distinction between a price paid down in one sum for the out-and-out purchase of the minerals forming part of land, and the rent and royalty, which constitute, in reality, a payment by instalments of the price of those minerals, is intelligible, though it may not be quite logical, thus affording an illustration of Lord Halsbury's observation in Quinn v. Leathem, (1901) A.C. 495, 596, that law is not necessarily a logical Code and is not always logical at all. The view I take receives some support from the definition of the word "income" as given in the Oxford Dictionary, Vol. V, page 162. . . . The same view of the matter appears to have been adopted in the American Courts, in which it has been held that the term "income" includes a sum accruing as royalty under an oil lease of land granted in consideration of a royalty of part of the oil: see In re Woodburn's Estate, (1891) 21 Am. St. Rep. 932. In the case of a mine, the rent may be (a) fixed sum; (b) a certain annual sum; (c) a royalty on the amount of minerals extracted payable at fixed intervals or times; (d) such a royalty, but not less in the aggregate than a fixed amount each year (as in the lease produced in the present case); and (e) such royalty and a covenant to mine a certain minimum amount or pay royalty thereon. But whatever form the consideration for the lease may assume, the money or thing which is paid for the occupation of the mine, though it is in one sense a preferred debt is in its essence rent; and has all the qualities thereof; see Raynolds v. Hanna, (1893) 55 Fed. Rep. 783, 800, where it was held that money received as royalty from a mine was "income" and distributable as such and not as a part of the corpus of the estate, because royalty is the most appropriate word to apply to rental based on the quantity of coal or other mineral that is or may be taken from a mine (see also a number of similar cases collected in Barringer and Adams on Mines, pp. 9-15). I must hold consequently that the royalty received by the plaintiff is "income" within the meaning of Act II of 1886,—Monindra Chandra Nandi v. Secretary of State, (1907) 34 C. 257, 285. This judgment was approved by the Privy Council in Kamakshya Narayan Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1943 I.T.R. 513. There is no difference in this respect between the Act of 1886 and the present Act.

In Kamakshya Narayan Singh's Case, referred to above the assessee contended that the earlier rulings were all wrong and that a coal royalty was not income at all but a payment for a capital asset. The claim was rejected. Income is not any the less income because it arises out of sinking capital in a wasting subject matter. Gowan v. Christie, (1873) 2 H. L. (Sc.) 273 on which the assessee relied did not relate to taxation but to whether a lease could be surrendered or not; and the decision in Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 1 Tax Cas. 287 did not turn on any special provisions in the United Kingdom Statutes, and the fact that 'mines' are specifically referred to in the United Kingdom Income-tax Acts but not in the Indian Acts makes no difference. A mining royalty is "in substance a rent; it is the compensation which the occupier pays the landlord for that species of occupation which the contract between them allows" per Lord Denman in R. v. Westbrook, (1875) 10 Q.B. 178. It is a periodical payment for the continuous enjoyment of the various benefits under the lease.

In a case in which the assessee allowed his tenants to extract earth containing saltpetre, it was claimed that the receipts from the tenants were capital receipts for the sale of the earth. The claim was disallowed. Maharaja Guru Sahi v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 2 I.T.C. 281; 6 Pat. 29; A.I.R. 1927 Pat. 133. So also a claim that income from bricklands let-out for brickmaking was a capital receipt from the sale of the soil once for all, Maharani of Bettiah v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. and O., 5 I.T.C. 42.

On the other hand, calling a payment a "royalty" will not make it so. In a case in which oil bearing land was sold, a part of the consideration being a percentage of the oil produced, the Privy Council held that the so-called royalty was really the payment of a part of the purchase price spread over several years. The point was that the vendor had parted with all his right to the land including the right to search for oil (not merely the latter) and was in no sense a joint adventurer with the purchaser in the business of oil prospecting or production, Minister of National Revenue (Canada) v. Cooper, (1933) A.C. 684.

Annuity—Payment for goodwill, etc.—In a case in which the assessee was a residuary legatee of her husband who was a senior partner in a firm the articles of partnership in which were: "In the event of the death of one or both of the senior partners, the remaining partners or partner may continue the use of the firm's name and established trade "marks" and goodwill paying quarterly to the Trustees of the deceased senior partner or partners the sum of £ 500 each for a period of five years for the privilege, after which it may be enjoyed without further payment . . . and in the event of the death of one or both of the senior partners and after 31st August, 1921, in the event of the death of a specified junior partner the surviving partner or partners shall proceed to liquidate all business open at the time of the partner's death, a period of six months being allowed for this purpose, and shall then pay over to the executors the deceased partner's ascertainable share of capital, etc." Rowlatt, J., held that the quarterly payments were income paid for the use of the firm's name, goodwill, etc., a payment concurrent with the enjoyment of the thing for which the payment is made, though the payment was only for five years, Commissioner of Inland Revenue v. Mrs. Mackintosh, 14 Tax Cases 15; 7 A.T.C. 212; 154 L.T. 141.

The widow of a dentist sold his practice to his assistant for £15,000, out of which £ 5,000 was paid in cash and the balance was to be paid in ten equal instalments of a quarter of the net profits each year, the primary price being increased or decreased as the case may be. The Special Commissioners and Finlay, J., held that the annual sums were income but the Court of Appeal held otherwise. There is no reason why a creditor who has sold property for a particular price should not, in discharge of the price, agree to accept a fluctuating sum if it suits both him and the buyer to do so. In this case the primary price of £15,000 was not an otiose figure; it permeated the whole contract and could be enforced in various events, the quarter share of profits being only an alternative, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Ramsay, 20 Tax Cases 79; 154 L.T. 141.

On the other hand, where a production executive of a film company entitled to salary and a share of profits surrendered his rights and agreed to be paid at a percentage of the receipts of the company in respect of certain pictures (above a minimum fixed limit), it was held that his share of receipts was not capital. There was no antecedent debt due to him, and what he received was a share of the revenue of the company, paid to him as his remuneration, Asher v. London Film Pictures, 1943 (C.A.).

A owned the leasehold of a property subject to a ground rent of £300. The property was sub-let to B for a gross rent of £1,625. A contracted to sell his interest to B by two deeds. The first deed assigned to B the property for the remainder of the lease subject to the payment of the ground-rent to the landlord, the consideration being the payment of £1,000 by B to A. Under the second deed B agreed to pay to A £1,625 per annum by quarterly payments for the remainder of the term of lease. No sum was settled in lump as the price of the property. Held, that the quarterly payments were income and not capital.

Per Walton, J.—It is obvious that there will be cases in which it will be very difficult to distinguish between an agreement to pay a debt by instalments and an agreement for good consideration to make certain annual payments for a fixed number of years.

In the one case there is an agreement for good consideration to pay a fixed gross amount and to pay it by instalments; in the other, there is an agreement for good consideration not to pay any fixed gross amount but to make a certain or it may be an uncertain number of annual payments. The distinction is a fine one and seems to depend on whether the agreement between the parties involves an obligation to pay a fixed gross sum—Chadwick v. Pearl Life Assurance Co., (1905) 2 K.B. 507.

The above dictum must not be read with an emphasis on the words “fixed gross sum”. A lump sum from sale would not cease to be of a capital nature merely because the actual amount to be received depended on certain subsequent considerations. Where a creditor in bankruptcy proceedings entered into a compromise under which he received certain amounts outright and certain further instalments so long as the debtor was alive, it was held that the last-mentioned instalments were capital receipts. The case was one of compromising a capital debt and not one of converting capital into annuities; the intention clearly was to receive something less than what was due, even if the debtor had lived longer than he did, Dott v. Brown, (1936) 1 All.E.R. 543; 15 A.T.C. 147 (C.A.).

A company which held the whole of the issued capital of another, making bicycles and tricycles, sold the shares to a third company, the purchase price being made up of a number of items; most of them related assets in the balance sheet, but one of them was a periodical payment at so much per machine sold. The purchaser held the option between certain specified dates to commute these periodical payments into a lump sum. The question arose as to the true nature of these periodical receipts, and it was held that they were of an income nature, being payments, not related to an antecedent debt and capable of being in perpetuity while the right of commutation was unilateral. Inland Revenue v. 36—49 Holdings, Ltd., 1943 (C.A.).

Patents—Sale of—Receipt from.—A, a non-resident alien, gave to B, an English Company, the right to sell and manufacture certain articles by a secret process in return for a payment of a percentage on the gross receipts from sales. Before paying the amount to A, B deducted the income-tax due thereon. Held, that B was entitled to do so, the payment being the income of A.

Per Phillimore, J.—This case is not like Scoble's case, (1903) 1 K.B. 494; (1903) A.C. 299; 4 Tax Cases 618 or the case of Foley v. Fletcher, (1858) 28 L. J. Ex. 100; 3 H. & N. 769, because there is no first ascertaining of a lump sum and it is an arrangement under which no lump sum is apportioned to the annual payment, and I cannot help noticing—whether the argument carries force with me or not, it certainly did seem to carry force with the House of Lords—that the process by which the annuity was ascertained in that case was a process which involved in the first instance the finding of a lump sum. To my mind it can make no difference but it obviously made a difference with the House of Lords in the case of Scoble v. Secretary of State for India and if it does make a difference in the opinion of the highest tribunal I must pay attention to it. I find here there is no such fact. Therefore upon the whole I think this is an annuity,—Delage v. Nugget Polish Co., (1905) 92 L.T. 682.

The British Dye Stuffs Corporation gave an American Company the right to exploit its patents and secret processes in certain territories. In return the Corporation received £25,000 a year for 10 years. Held, that the annual payments were income and not the repayment in instalments of the purchase price of a capital asset.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"It is one of those cases that just depends really on how you look at it. . . . It is really using this property if you like and taking an annual return, for it roughly corresponds probably to its average life, and not a sale once and for all of a capital asset."

Per Bankes, L.J.—"I do not myself think that the method of payment adopted in carrying through a transaction . . . is very much a guide of the true nature of the transaction. I read this agreement taking it as a whole as a trading convention. . . . The amount which is payable by the one company to the other is not in truth and in fact the purchase price of part of the property of the English Company, but it is only a method of arriving at the value of the processes and patents. . . ."; per Warrington, L.J. "the whole transaction . . . is a trading convention . . . regulating the mode in which they should respectively carry on their trade, and the mode in which they should co-operate with each other in so doing . . . it is a fixed sum paid . . . as a payment for the profits to be derived by them from the working of the convention." British Dye Stuffs Corporation v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 3 A.T.C. 532; 12 Tax Cases 586; 129 L.T. 538.

A company sold the patent rights it had to two Companies in Japan and America respectively in consideration of a lump sum payable by 10 equal instalments plus a royalty in the former case and in consideration of a certain share in the American Company in the latter case. Held by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Rowlatt, J.) that it was a question of fact—to be decided by the Commissioners—whether the company was trading in patents or merely realised its capital rights in its patents and that even on merits the findings of the Commissioners were right, viz., that the money received in addition to the royalty was capital, Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate, 9 Tax Cases 520.

An assessee was the joint inventor and jointly entitled to letters patent in respect of certain appliances which were manufactured and sold, under a licence from the assessee and his co-inventor, by a company of which they were the sole directors and shareholders. In conjunction with the company they agreed to sell to another company, inter alia, (a) the said inventions, letters patent and all rights appertaining thereto, and (b) the goodwill of the company, in consideration of a sum of £750, payable as to £300 by three instalments of £100 each and as to the balance of £450 by a "royalty". There was no liability to super-tax in respect of this payment of £750, which was a capital receipt. The purchasers also agreed to pay by way of additional consideration a "further royalty" of 10 per cent. upon the invoice price of all machines constructed under the said inventions and sold during a period of ten years. Held, that the "further royalty" did not constitute part of a capital sum but represented a share of the profits of the purchasing company and formed part of the income of the assessee and that, as such, it had been correctly included in the assessment to super-tax made upon him.

Per Rowlatt, J.—I do not think there is any law of nature, or any invariable principle, that because you can say a certain payment is considered for the transfer of property, therefore, it must be looked upon as the price in the character of principal. It seems to me that you must look at every case, and see what the sum is. A man may sell his property for a sum which is to be paid in instalments, and when you see that that is the case, that is not income or any part of it—that was the case of Foley v. Fletcher, 7 W.R. 141; 3 H. & N. 769. A man may sell his property for what is an annuity, that is to say, he causes the principal to disappear and an annuity to take its place. If you can see that that is what it is, then the Income-tax Act taxes it. Or a man may sell his property for what looks like an annuity, you can see quite well from the transaction that it is not really a transmutation of a principal sum into an annuity, but that it is really a principal sum the payment of which is being spread over a time, and is being paid with interest, and it is all being calculated in a way familiar to accountants and actuaries, although taking the form only of an annuity. That was Scoble's case, 4 Tax Cases 618 when you break up the sum and decide what it really was. On the other hand, a man may sell his property nakedly for a share of the profits of a business, and if he does that, I think the share of the profits of the business would be undoubtedly the price paid for his property, but still that would be the share of the profits of the business and would bear the character of income in his hands, because that is the nature of it. It was a case like that which came before Mr. Justice Walton in Chadwick v. Pearl Life Insurance Company, (1905) 2 K.B. 507. It was not the profits of a business, but a man was clearly bargaining to have an income secured to him, and not a capital sum at all, namely, the income which corresponded with the rent which he had before.

I therefore think that what one has to do is to look and see what the sum payable really is. The ascertaining of an antecedent debt is not the only thing that governs it. It does not govern it by magic, but it is a very valuable guide in a great many cases, undoubtedly. Here, the property was sold for a certain sum, and in addition the vendor took an annual sum which was dependent, in effect, on the volume of business done; that is to say, he took something which rose or fell with the chances of the business. I think, when a man does that, he does take an income,—William John Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 Tax Cases 310; (1920) 1 K.B. 711.

By an agreement between an inventor and a company formed to develop his patents the inventor was guaranteed a minimum royalty for a specified period. Held, that the guaranteed payments were not capital receipts but income to the inventor, Wild v. Ionides, 9 Tax Cases 392.

An assessee was a joint inventor of synchronising gears which were patented both in the United Kingdom and in the U.S.A. The inventions were used by the Governments of both countries during the war; and ultimately the inventors were given £70,000 by the British Government and £15,000 by the United States Government for the use of the patent.

The assessee claimed that the payments were capital and not liable to tax. Held, by the House of Lords that, in view of the fact that the corpus of the patent had not been given up by the inventor and that the Royal Commission for Awards had fixed the compensation at the probable reasonable royalty for four years, as between a willing licensor and a willing licensee the payments represented royalties for four years and were therefore taxable as income, Constantinesco v. The King, 11 Tax Cases 730; 43 T.L.R. 727.

In a similar case, Mills v. Jones, 14 Tax Cases 769 the award was for a lump sum "in respect of all user, past, present and future, by or for the purposes of His Majesty's Government (including user by way of selling for use, licensing or otherwise dealing)"; and an attempt was made to distinguish it from the Constantinesco case on the ground that it included an award for the future also and that, as the latter was of a capital nature and could not be separated, no part of the lump sum could be taxed. The House of Lords negatived this contention since the Commissioners had found that the payment in respect of the future was negligible. Presumably if the figures could have been separated, a part would have been income and a part capital.

In Ducker v. Rees Roturbo Development Syndicate, 7 A.T.C. 42; (1928) A.C. 132 the House of Lords followed the California Copper Syndicate (5 Tax Cases 159) and Melbourne Trust cases (1914) A.C. 1001 and reaffirmed the principle that "a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme of profit making" was taxable. The point in issue was whether in this particular case there was a solitary or accidental disposal of a capital asset or whether the company sold its patents as a regular and systematic business. The question was one of fact and there was no misdirection on the part of the Commissioners. Though the line in dispute was one which the company did not intend to develop extensively there was evidence to show that it intended to sell and make profits on the patents. The House of Lords therefore declined to interfere.

An assessee possessed patents for certain machines and processes. In selling these machines he sold to the purchasers also the right to use the processes not only within the buyer's mills, but if necessary beyond. He also agreed not to instal his machines—with one exception—in the neighbourhood of his purchaser's mills. He claimed that his receipts from the processes (as distinct from the machines) were the sale-proceeds of selling an exclusive right to the patents and therefore capital receipts. The Special Commissioners held that the profits arose from the sale of the machines and that the patent rights were given in order to make the machines more saleable. Rowlatt, J., found that there was enough evidence before the Special Commissioners to arrive at the finding, Brandwood v. Banker, 14 Tax Cases 44; 7 A.T.C. 208.

A person who divulges his secret knowledge or process in return for some compensation is parting with a capital asset, viz., the secrecy and such compensation is of a capital nature even though the person might continue to exploit the knowledge himself, since he has lost the advantage of secrecy. It is immaterial for this purpose whether the process could have been patented or not, Handley Page v. Butterworth, 12 A.T.C. 541; 19 Tax Cases 328 H.L.

A company acquired the exclusive right of translation and publication in English of a French book by an author in French, to whom the company agreed to pay a lump sum for a certain number of copies of the best edition sold, and thereafter a percentage on sales of that edition and of cheaper editions. The book was a failure, and nothing beyond the lump sum was paid. It was held that the lump sum was not a capital receipt but of the nature of a royalty since the company did not get a complete assignment of the copyright but only a limited licence to translate and publish in English, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Longmans Green & Co., Ltd., 17 Tax Cases 272.

Even though you need not completely part with a patent, if you take a lump sum for its use (a lump sum fixed in advance) the mere fact that a part of the lump sum is permitted to be paid in instalments will not make them income, De Soutter Bros., Ltd. v. Hanger & Co., Ltd., and artificial Limb Makers, Ltd., 15 A.T.C. 49; (1936) 1 All.E.R. 535.

A licence to exploit a patent, even if an exclusive licence, is not the same as a sale, especially if the licensor is bound to prevent others (including himself) from exploiting the licensed territory; and if such a licence is given for a period of years in return partly for a lump sum (or sums) to be paid in advance and partly for annual payments (not being instalments of a previously fixed lump sum), the lump sums may be capital while the annual payments are income. Whether a payment is of the nature of royalty (income) or not must be examined with reference to the facts of each case and the fact that both the parties call it royalty, while not conclusive, cannot be ignored, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. British Salmson Aero Engines, 17 A.T.C. 187 (C.A.).

In Margerison v. Tyresoles, Ltd., 1943 K.B.D., a company in possession of a patented process set up and operated plants (which remained its property) in the premises of 'distributors' who paid a rent for the plant and in addition a certain other sum. The company bound itself not to set up or permit the setting up of similar plant, and not to canvas orders, within a defined area for each distributor for a fixed period but determinable in certain events. It was held that the additional sums received were of a capital nature, arising out of the company's parting with its freedom of action within the defined area.

If the agreements refer both to payments for the user of a patent and to other payments, it is open to the Crown to go behind the agreements and to ascertain what in fact the payments do represent, Paterson Engineering Co. v. Duff, 1943 K.B.D.

The trustees of the late Earl Haig arranged with an author to publish a book based on Lord Haig's diaries, the profits being equally divided between both. The author received from the publishers a 25 per cent. royalty subject to a minimum of £10,000 paid in advance, and a further £10,000 in four instalments from another source in return for 'serial' rights. He was assessed on his own share in these sums and the question arose whether the share of the trustees in them was taxable. The answer was given in the negative, because the receipts were really for the partial realisation of the asset, the greater part of the publicity value of the diaries being exhausted by the transaction, which had no resemblance to the user of a property on terms requiring its return substantially with undiminished value, Earl Haigs Executors v. Inland Revenue, 18 A.T.C. 226 (C.S.).

Where a sum of £150 was given by a publisher to an author to revise a book written by him, he having written no other book, it was held that the item was a capital receipt. Beare v. Carter, (K.B.D.) 1940 I.T.R. 127.

On the other hand, when an authoress who owned the copyright of her novels, cancelled the ordinary licence given to a publisher to publish three of her novels and gave him the sole right to publish them during the whole of her period of copyright and received the consideration in instalments it was held that her receipts—whether royalties or payments for copyright—were all profits from her profession as an authoress. It was argued unsuccessfully on her behalf that this was the only occasion on which she had sold the copyright outright and that it was not usual for authors to make such outright sales. Glasson v. Rougier, 1944 K.B.D.

When the vocation is that of a dramatist or playwright, it is an ordinary incident of the disposition of plays either to realise them by means of royalties or by outright sale; either way, it is merely the realisation of what may be regarded as the circulating capital of the dramatist, his brain being the fixed capital and his circulating capital the plays which, no doubt, may be regarded for certain purposes as property but at the same time may be realised in the course of the business which he carries on. Billam v. Griffith, 1941 K.B.D.

Receipts for performance of services are always of a revenue nature; it is only in the case of sale of property that the question can arise whether the gain is capital or revenue. Where, therefore an individual, not a professional author, sold the serial rights in his life story to a newspaper, it was held that what he received was not the price of the copyright, but remuneration for writing the serial articles and therefore income. Hobbs v. Hussey, 1943 I.T.R. (Sup.) 48.

Where certain race horse owners jointly bought a stallion for the free service of which they had proportionate rights but sold their rights to outsiders, it was held that the sale proceeds were income, being the realisation of the reproductive faculties of the stallion and not representing any capital accretion of property. The fact that there was no 'trade' was immaterial. So long as the item is of a revenue nature it is taxable, if from trade under case I of Schedule D (corresponding to section 10 in India) otherwise under Case V, (corresponding to section 12 in India), Leader v. Counsel, 1943 I.T.R. 43 (Sup.).

Some of the English authorities were reviewed by the Lahore High Court in Anantram Khem Chand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1937 I.T.R. 511; I.L.R. (1938) Lah. 210; A.I.R. 1937 Lah. 880, who laid down the test that if there is an out-and-out sale of a patent by the patentee for a definite price, even though the price is payable only in instalments, then the instalments are not income. On the other hand, if what is granted is a working licence in return for an annual payment, then the receipt is taxable as income.

Land—Price of.—Under an agreement between a local authority and a company, the authority purchased the site and erected the buildings required for generating electricity and the company fitted up plant for the undertaking. The company received the profits from electricity, and paid the authority every half-year the amount paid in the previous half-year by the authority in re-payment of the debt incurred by the authority in acquiring the land and erecting the buildings. Held, that the half-yearly payments made by the company were not capital in the hands of the authority. Surbiton Urban District Council v. Callender Cable and Construction Co., (1910) 74 J.P. 88.

Where a local authority took over the liability, in perpetuity to repair and maintain certain streets which were maintainable by certain trustees, and as consideration for the arrangement, the trustees paid twenty annual instalments of a certain sum each, it was held that the payments were not income of the local authority but capital receipts, Goole Corporation v. Acre and Calder Navigation Authorities, 1942 K.B.D.

Advances—‘One-man’ Companies.—An assessee was the sole director and was in complete control of a limited company, of which the whole of the share capital, consisting of 2,500 £10 shares had been allotted to him in 1911 as part of the consideration for the sale to the company of his business. Of these shares, 2,499 had been continuously held by him until September, 1917, when the company was voluntarily wound up. The one remaining share had been given to a former employee, from whom it was purchased in May, 1917, by the assessee's daughter. The company had made considerable profits during the years 1911 to 1917 but had declared no dividends, the profits made up to 1916 having been accumulated and used for the purposes of the business. In the year 1916-17 the company, under the authority of its Memorandum of Association, had advanced to the assessee without interest and without security various sums, amounting in the aggregate to £6,531, which in the company's balance-sheets were described as “Loans or Advances”, and these moneys were utilised by him to purchase War Stock in his own name. In winding up the company's affairs in 1917 the Liquidator had not required the assessee to repay to the company the sums in question, but had taken them into account in determining the share of the assets to which the assessee was entitled. An assessment had been made upon the assessee upon the basis that the payments, amounting to £6,531, made to him by the company in the year 1916-17 were in fact not “Loans or Advances” but constituted income received by him. Upon appeal the Special Commissioners had found as facts (inter alia)—that the company was a properly constituted legal entity, that it had power to make, and did make, loans to the assessee, and that such loans did not form part of the assessee's income; and they accordingly discharged the assessment. On appeal to the High Court Mr. Justice Rowlatt, ordered the case to be remitted to the Special Commissioners on the ground that they had not found as a fact whether the business had been carried on by the company or whether it had really been carried on by the assessee to the exclusion of the company. . . . The assessee appealed against Mr. Justice Rowlatt's order remitting the case to the Special Commissioners. Judgment was delivered by the Court of Appeal against the Crown, on the ground that by their findings of fact in the case stated the Special Commissioners had by implication found as a fact that the business was carried on by the company and not by the assessee, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sansom, 8 Tax Cases 20; (1921) 2 K.B. 492.

An assessee was the controlling shareholder of five private limited companies. From time to time he withdrew sums of money from each company, which were shown as ‘loans’ in the accounts of the companies. The loans were not secured by any document, there was no provision for the re-payment of interest and the companies did not pay any dividends. One of the companies was liquidated voluntarily through the assessee as liquidator who did not settle the accounts with the shareholders but simply took over the business in the style of a firm and did not re-pay the loans taken by him. The Special Commissioners held that the loans in question were not genuine loans and should be assessed as income of the assessee.

Held, that there was evidence before the Commissioners to support their finding of fact, Jacobs v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 10 Tax Cases 1.

In a private company an assessee and his brother held all the ordinary shares and by virtue of the articles the company was entirely under their control. For some years the company had paid no dividend on the ordinary shares though it had made large profits. On the other hand it had made large loans to the two brothers. Under the articles the company could lend money; and it was conceded by the Crown that the loans were bona fide loans. On 31st December, 1919, the brothers owed the company about £283,000; and the company had large accumulated profits. The brothers wanted to write off the loans but were advised by Counsel that a reconstruction was necessary for the purpose. Nevertheless on the advice of their auditor the company wrote up the values of their assets by £226,000 and transferred this amount to a newly opened General Reserve to which they also transferred £57,000 from the undivided profits. To the other side of this reserve they transferred the loans so that the reserve automatically vanished. The Special Commissioners held that in effect the profits had been distributed as far as they could go (i.e., £117,000) to meet the sum of £283,000. Held, reversing the decision of the Special Commissioners that the write off of the loans did not effect a distribution of the profits.

Per Rowlatt, J.—Of course if a General Reserve Fund had been created in effect, and allowed to live beyond its birth, it would have appeared in the next balance-sheet simply as a liability against the whole body of assets and if that had been divided, say as a bonus dividend, and if a bonus dividend had been divided to that amount, that bonus dividend undoubtedly would have been good so far as the undivided profits existed to satisfy it. It would not have gone against the general reserve in particular; it would merely have been taken out of the assets of the company and it would have been good so far as there was profits to meet it. But it seems to me perfectly clear that these people had no intention whatever of dividing their undivided profits up to the hilt. . . . What they purported to do, in perfectly clear terms, was this: "We are going to create a fund to give to these people, to treat as belonging to these people, in order to cancel their loans against us. We are going to create a particular fund. We are going to do it by writing up the assets to the tune of £226,000. We are going to put into it profits to the tune of £57,000." I cannot conceive how it can be said that the action of dividing whatever profits there might be beyond the £57,000 can be attributed to them. . . . Now supposing that the loan had been exactly of the same amount as the amount that was obtained by the inflation in the valuing up of the assets and they had said, "We will carry to General Reserve Account the amount by which we inflated the assets. We will leave the exact amounts of the loans and we will carry to the Reserve Account the amounts of the loans too and so cancel them." Could it then have been said, "Well, although they have said nothing whatever about profits, and are simply seeking to cancel the loan against the inflation of their fixed assets, they are to be taken volentes volentes as having distributed the undivided profits, though they never hinted that they wanted to disturb the profits of the company in the smallest degree? I do not think it would have been said. On the other hand . . .

supposing that the loans had amounted to just the same amount as the amount which they were taking from the profits, and they had not inflated the assets at all . . . that would have been the strongest possible case for the Crown. They have mixed the two together. . . . Now am I to hold that the Commissioners were entitled to dissect this combined fund, so to speak, and attribute £57,000—because I do not see that they could do more—to the cancellation of the loan? . . .

There is another fact which in my judgment just turns the scale. They sought to cancel these loans altogether. I am conceiving the possibility that they cancelled them to the tune of £57,000 by the division of profits. But the loans were not owing to the two brothers equally. The £57,000 has got to be apportioned between them somehow; either it has got to be said that the loans were written off equally in point of amount, but not equally in proportion, or I have got to say that there has got to be a distribution of profits, not on the footing of equality between the shares, because the brothers had the same shares, but giving a greater dividend to one brother in order that he might have a proper proportion of his loan written off. Whichever you do, you have to mould the transaction into a shape that the people never intended it should bear. Non constat that they would have written off any of the loan if they could not write it all off; non constat that they would have written it off unequally as regards proportion; non constat that they would have written off equally as regards proportions and therefore unequally as regards amount. It seems to me that in the result I cannot hold that it is open to the Commissioners to say that they can treat this transaction as necessarily having the effect of a distribution of profits. I can quite understand that when a series of acts are done and are called by a wrong name, you can apply the right name to them and the Court is not to be constrained by language; but it does seem to me here that what is sought to be done and has been done has gone beyond that and the Commissioners have taken it upon themselves to say that one set of facts shall be another set of facts,—Hall v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 11 Tax Cases 24; 135 L.T. 759.

The Court of Appeal, following Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co., 32 Ch. D. 283, affirmed Rowlatt J.'s judgment. The point stressed by that Court was that the debts due by the shareholders had not been validly cancelled, i.e., the Directors still owed the loans to the company since there was no consideration in return for which the loans could have been cancelled.

A floated company X which substantially owned another company Y. A received a loan from Y and agreed to repay it in instalments. The shares of the companies were of little nominal value but were floated at high premia. In effect A merely got back from Y what he paid to X as share value. A successfully avoided surtax on the ground that he was paying Y the instalments under a "deed of covenant", (cf. Commissioner of Inland Revenue v. Duke of Westminster, (1936) A.C. 1; 19 Tax Cases 490; 51 T.L.R. 467 H.L.) There was no finding in the case that the two companies were dummies and were really doing the business of A, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Morgan-Grenville-Gavin, 20 Tax Cases 529; (1936) 1 A.E.R. 895.

Sir D. M. Petit formed four private limited companies, each with a capital of between 30 to 40 lakhs, and owned all the shares excepting three held by his subordinate employees. Sir D. M. Petit paid for the shares allotted to him by agreeing to make over to each company a block of shares and securities of other concerns which he held, but as a matter of fact he did not so make over the shares, each company, at the time of its formation, appointing him or his nominee as trustee for itself to hold the shares on its behalf and allowing him to keep the shares without formal transfer to the company until the company should call upon him to do so. The shares were in Sir D. M. Petit's name. When he received dividends and interest, book entries were made in each company crediting them with dividends and interest on securities, giving Sir D. M. Petit loan at 6 per cent. without security or voucher. Neither capital nor loan nor interest was ever repaid. The memorandum of each company contained 38 objects but the companies did nothing beyond receiving dividends and giving loans to the assessee. This continued for six years, during which period no dividend was declared by these four companies. Held, that the Income-tax Officer could enquire into the genuineness of such companies, though he should not start with the presumption that they are simulacra or shams, and that in this case there was evidence to justify the finding that the loans were not genuine. Held also, that a formal transfer of shares is not in itself conclusive proof of the ownership of shares, In re Sir D. M. Petit, 2 I.T.C. 255; 51 Bom. 372.

As regards one-man companies, see also section 23-A and notes thereunder.

Insurance of lives of employees.—In a trading company, both goods and services fall in the same class. Expenditure on both is revenue expenditure; and income from both is revenue. Receipts from insurance of goods are on the same footing as sale-proceeds of goods; and similarly receipts from insurance policies on the lives of employees for the benefit of the company are receipts on revenue account. The question is not whether a receipt arises periodically or once for all but what is its nature. Just as it will make no difference whether a temporary disability payment is paid week by week or in a lump sum, it makes no difference whether the lump sum payment is made at death or periodically from the date of death to the date up to which the employee's service was estimated to continue. The point is that the receipt compensates for the loss of income represented by the employee's services, Murphy v. Gray & Co., 23 Tax Cases 225; 1940 I.T.R. (Sup.) 1 (K.B.). If money so received by a company in respect of the death of a director is distributed to shareholders the latter are taxable since there is a distribution of revenue profit. Inland Revenue v. Williams' Executors, 1943 I.T.R. (Sup.) (H.L.).

A sum received in payment of a life or other insurance policy, unrelated to any business, is however ordinarily of the nature of capital. See Shaw Wallace & Co.'s Case, 59 I.H. 206 and Fletcher's Case, 1937 I.T.R. 428 (P.C.). Accordingly section 4 (3) (v) which in terms stated that a capital sum received in payment of any insurance policy was exempt was deleted in 1939 as being superfluous. See also notes under section 4 (3) (v).

Release from debt.—A release from a past debt, assuming the transactions to be bona fide is not necessarily a trading receipt of the year in which the debt is cancelled. If the debt was, for example, forgiven solely in order to save the debtor from foundering, the forgiven debt need not be added to the debtor's trading receipts of the year in which the debt is forgiven, British Mexican Petroleum Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 570 (H.L.). Ordinarily, however a cancelled debt would automatically swell the profits. See also notes under section 13 about "re-opening of old accounts". Where an assessee received from his auditor certain payments representing embezzlements by assessee's employees in earlier years not detected by the auditor then, it was held that the payments were trading receipts following Green v. Glikston & Son, 14 Tax Cases 364 (H.L.); (1929) A.C. 381 referred to under section 10 (2) (iv). There is nothing in the British Mexican Petroleum Case to prevent the taxation of such sums as income, in fact, they are trading receipts, Gray v. Lord Penrhyn, 16 A.T.C. 221; (1937) 3 All.E.R. 468.

Sinking fund.—The Nizam's Government guaranteed a company which constructed a railway in Hyderabad an annuity for 20 years of 5 per cent. on the issued share and debenture capital, to be applied in paying interest on such capital and in forming a sinking fund for the redemption of the debentures, subject to provisions for repayment of the sums paid, with interest, out of profits earned. Held, that the whole annuity, including the sums applied to sinking funds, was chargeable with duty, Blake v. Imperial Brazilian Railway, 2 Tax Cases 58; 1 T.L.R. 68 followed; Nizam's Guaranteed State Railway Co. v. Wyatt, 2 Tax Cases 584; 24 Q.B.D. 548.

Interest on securities—Sales "cum" interest.—Under a contract of sale dated 29th November certain securities of a company the interest on which was payable half-yearly on 31st May and 30th November under deduction of income-tax were sold together with the accrued interest. The actual transfer was made on 14th December. The books of the company were closed from 16th to 30th November; and the interest was paid by the company to the vendor, who made it over to the purchaser under the Rules of the Stock Exchange. Held, that the interest was the income of the purchaser and not of the vendor, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sir John Oakley, 9 Tax Cases 582. In the hands of the latter it would have been a capital receipt. This latter point arose in the following case in which stock was sold cum interest and it was held that the interest was included in the price.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"The truth of the matter is that the seller does not receive 'interest', and 'interest' is the subject-matter of taxation. He receives the price of the expectancy of interest and that is not the subject of taxation. You cannot put the case without relying on the theory that the interest accrues de die diem. If that could be said, it would be at any rate correct in point of figures and economics but that cannot be said. . . . The point of course is that there is no guarantee that when the due time comes the purchaser will get the interest. So many contingencies might intervene", Wigmore v. Thomas Summerson & Sons, 9 Tax Cases 577; 41 T.L.R. 379.

It follows from this that what the vendor gets is part of "capital" unless his circumstances are such that he is held to trade in such securities or shares. This view was endorsed (obiter) by the Patna High Court in Rajni Prasad Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, I.L.R. 9 Pat. 194; 4 I.T.C. 264.

Where a security is sold cum interest after the due date for payment of interest, the purchaser drawing the interest, and not the vendor, the vendor cannot claim for the purpose of assessment that the interest should be treated as his income and that he should be given a refund of tax; on the other hand, if he is a dealer in securities, the profits from the purchase and sale of securities will be taxable in his hands, Rm. Ar. Ar. Rm. Arunachallam Chettiar Brothers v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 3 I.T.C. 38; A.I.R. 1929 Mad. 769.

The mere quotation in the bargain of estimated accrued interest does not establish a separate contract in respect of interest and even if such a separate contract were established, it would remain part and parcel of the purchase consideration, Haveli Shah Sardari Lal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1936) I.T.R. 297; A.I.R. 1937 Lah. 435.

Where certain executors of the estate of a deceased person transferred certain bonds together with accrued interest to the Inland Revenue in payment of estate duty it was held that no part of the interest was taxable as income of the estate, Monks v. Fox's Executors, 13 Tax Cases 171; (1928) 1 K.B. 351.

Sales 'cum' dividend.—On the 25th November, 1919, an assessee purchased certain shares in a company for a sum exceeding their par value by £50, the excess being expressed in the contract to be paid "to cover the portion of the dividend accrued to date." On the 13th May, 1920, a dividend of 10 per cent. free of income-tax was declared and paid by the company for the year ending the 28th February, 1920. . . . The assessee contended that, of the dividend so receivable on his shares, £50 plus income-tax (i.e., £71 in all) should be treated as capital in view of the terms of the contract of purchase. Held, that the transaction was in substance an ordinary one of purchase of shares, and that the sum of £71 in question could not be excluded from the assessee's taxable income. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest, 8 Tax Cases 704; (1924) Sess. Cas. 450.

That dividends and interest are normally the income of the owner of the shares or securities on the dates on which the dividend or interest falls due was reaffirmed in a case in which the executors of a deceased person were not permitted to apportion dividends and interest due and received after the death of the deceased as partly relating to the period before death. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Henderson's Executors, 16 Tax Cases 282; 1931 S.C. 681.

An assessee arranged with a financial corporation for the sale at a price of £3 per share of the whole of his shareholding, comprising 79,920 out of the total issued ordinary share capital of 80,552 £1 shares, in a company of which he was the Managing Director. One of the conditions of the proposed purchase was that, prior to the transfer of the shares, the assessee, through his controlling interest in the company, should make the company declare out of the balance of its undivided profits a bonus or special dividend of 10s. per share on its ordinary shares, the proceeds of which should be held by the assessee as part of the agreed purchase price. The company duly declared such bonus or special dividend free of income-tax, and free also of super-tax up to a sum not exceeding £6,000 should a claim upon any shareholder for the latter tax arise by reason of the receipt of the bonus. The assessee received from the company two months later, a payment of £39,960 in respect of the bonus or special dividend on his shares. The terms of the agreement for sale were first included in a written document a month after he received the special dividend. In that document the purchase price was stated to be £2.10 per share, but it was also stated that the assessee was entitled to, and had previously received, the bonus or special dividend of 10s. per share, which had already been declared. Upon appeal by the assessee the Special Commissioners held that the sum £39,960 and the income-tax applicable thereto constituted part of the purchase price of the shares and did not form part of the assessee's total income upon which he was liable to super-tax. Held, that the evidence before the Special Commissioners did not justify the conclusion of fact that an enforceable agreement for sale had existed between the parties prior to the written agreement and that the bonus or special dividend therefore formed part of the assessee's income and had not been received by him on behalf of the purchaser, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Frank Bernard Sanderson, 8 Tax Cases 38. The sum of £6,000 above referred to was paid by the company on account of the super-tax payable by Sir F. B. Sanderson and the question was raised whether the amount was his "income". Held, that it was part of the purchase price of the shares sold by him and not received by him in his capacity as shareholder and therefore not chargeable to any tax.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"One cannot look at it as a dividend; it is not one. It is not a percentage on the shares . . . it is with reference to an unascertained sum. (As to 'unascertained'—'you cannot declare a thing free of super-tax which would only come on next year, if it will please Parliament and to an amount in the pound which will please Parliament.'). . . . He was not entitled as against the company at any time to have his £6,000. . . . It simply was a statement that the company would do what was anticipated. . . . This money came to him under and because of the execution of and not before the agreement . . ." Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sanderson, 8 Tax Cases 38.

See, however, sections 44-E and 44-F of the Indian Act which apply to certain types of sales and purchases of stocks and shares, following similar provisions in the United Kingdom Law consequent on the above rulings.

Accumulated dividends.—Mr. Bason was a substantial shareholder in a group of three private companies, which pooled their profits. A resolution was passed by the Directors of one of the companies that, after a dividend of 10 per cent. had been paid, 1/3rd of the balance of profits should be given as a bonus to the working Directors. Mr. Bason objected to the resolution and brought a suit. The money intended to be paid to the Directors was kept in suspense; and, finally, as a compromise, the company, with the consent of the Directors, paid Mr. Bason one lakh of rupees as his share of bonus. It was held that this was merely an accumulated dividend paid out of accumulated profits and taxable in the year of actual receipt, Bason v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 55 Cal. 987; 2 I.T.C. 523.

Where the sale and transfer of certain shares in a company were set aside by a Court on a suit by the vendor, after some years, on the ground that the purchaser had made fraudulent representation the Court ordered that in addition to the retransfer of the shares to the vendor, the purchaser should pay a lump sum representing the loss of the vendor on the transaction including dividends in the interval. It was held that the effect of the Court's order was to revert the property in the vendor as from the date of sale and that therefore the vendor was taxable on the dividends during the interval which were refunded to him by the purchaser, Spence v. Inland Revenue, 24 Tax Cases 311 (C.S.).

Isolated transaction—Profit from.—A company carried on business as Coal Merchants, Ship and Insurance Brokers, and as sole selling agents for various Colliery Companies. In the latter capacity it was part of the company's duty to purchase waggons on behalf of its clients. The company made a purchase of waggons on its own account as a speculation and subsequently disposed of them at a profit. It was contended that, this transaction being an isolated one, the profit was in the nature of a capital profit on the sale of an investment. Held, that the profit realised on this transaction was made in the operation of the company's business and was properly included in the computation of the company's profits.

Per Sankey, J.—"To begin with, the waggons were not bought as plant and machinery for the purpose of the appellant company's trade. . . . They were—I do not like to use for a moment in this connection the word 'capital'—no part of the capital bought for the purpose of the appellant company's trade and I do not think that the purchase price of the waggons when sold ever formed part of the capital of the business. It is expressly found that they had nothing to do with the purchase and sale of the waggons. Then it is admitted that these waggons were purchased for the purpose of resale. . . . I do not think that it is possible to say that the mere fact that it was an isolated transaction at once takes it out of the category of chargeable property. I think in most cases an isolated transaction does not fall to be chargeable but I think you have to consider the transaction and you cannot bring it down as a matter of law without regard to the circumstances. . . . Although it is perfectly true that the transaction began with one purchase and ended with one sale, that I think is only a coincidence," T. Beynon & Co., Ltd. v. Ogg, 7 Tax Cases 125.

See also section 4 (3) (vii), and the notes thereunder. Under that section, income is exempt if it is casual and non-recurring, and also not arising from a business, profession or vocation.

Hired out goods—Sale of—Surplus from.—A company manufacturing waggons also used to hire out some of the waggons. Later on it sold the waggons used for hire and the question arose whether the profits from the sale of waggons were 'profits' or 'capital'. The profits were calculated on the basis of excess of sale proceeds over book price (the latter including manufacturing profit already credited to the manufacturing department and taxed, but allowing for depreciation). The company claimed that hiring waggons was a separate business from selling waggons and that profits from selling outright the former class of waggons were an accretion of capital. Held, by the House of Lords, that the surplus was trading profits, as there was only one business; the waggons were not of the nature of plant but more of the nature of trading stock, even though they were hired out for some time before being sold, Gloucester Railway Carriage and Waggon Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 720; (1925) A.C. 469. If the company had brought all its waggons and only hired them to users and only incidentally sold some of the waggons, the decision would have been different.

Interest included in or of the nature of damages.—In In re National Bank of Wales, (1899) 2 Ch. 629, it was held that when a former director repaid the liquidator with interest the amount of dividends wrongly paid out of capital, the interest was not taxable as it was of the nature of damages. Interest which is taken into account in settling the amount of damages is not 'interest' but part of damages, i.e., it is a capital receipt and therefore not chargeable to tax, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Ballantine, 3 A.T.C. 716; 8 Tax Cases 595. Whether damages as such are income or capital is a different matter, see rulings referred to later and particularly those relating to cancelled contracts.

A sued B for an account of sums due to A as cestui que trust and obtained an order directing accounts to be taken of monies due to him or due to be invested on his behalf from time to time with compound interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum with yearly rests. The accountants of A and B were unable to agree and finally, a compromise was arrived at. The question arose whether the lump sum awarded to A included any interest and it was held that it did, since the suit was for accounts, i.e., certain sums together with interest, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Capt. Woolf Barnato, 20 Tax Cases 455; (1936) 2 All.E.R. 1176 (A.C.). Where there is a breach of trust and the person breaking it pays expressly both the principal lost and the interest thereon, it cannot be said that the entire payment is of the nature of capital damages assessed partly with reference to the interest that might have been earned, Sir Thomas Barlow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 A.T.C. 266 (K.B.).

Pending an appeal to the Privy Council, the High Court stayed the execution of the decree in a suit for a partition of a Hindu undivided family on the condition that the party asking for the stay gave security and also paid interest at 6 per cent. on the above security which was paid to the other party. The Privy Council dismissed the appeal and the interest periodically paid had not to be repaid. The question arose whether it was income in the hands of the recipient. Held, that it was income. In lieu of the enjoyment of his property from which he would have derived income he received 6 per cent. on the security amount. The income was also not of a casual or non-recurring nature, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Jagmohan Das Kastogi, 3 I.T.C. 274; A.I.R. 1929 Oudh 125.

Interest paid under section 28 of the Land Acquisition Act (received by a person not trading in land) has been held to be of the nature of capital and not of that of income because: (a) the payment is discretionary (on the part of the Court), (b) it relates to a period when the recipient has neither title nor possession of the source, viz., the land (there is no 'tree'; therefore, no 'fruit'), (c) it is not the potential profits of the recipient if he had retained the land, and (d) on the contrary it is a measure of damages for the period between the loss of possession of property and the receipt of consideration, Beharilal Bhargava v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1941 I.T.R. 9 (All.).

On the death of the holder of an impartible estate, a collateral took possession, both of movable and of immovable property, and a widow, along with others, sued for the recovery of the entire property on the ground that the collateral was not the rightful owner. The Court awarded the widow a number of movable properties and the total value of these properties together with the arrears of her maintenance allowance was a substantial figure. The Court also awarded damages for detention of properties. Ultimately, after some payments had been made there was a compromise, and sums paid by the judgment-debtor thereafter were to be allocated, by consent, in a fixed proportion between principal and damages. It was held that the damages were not of the nature of interest because the collateral was under no obligation to pay interest and what he paid was damages for detention. Commissioner of Income-tax B. & O. v. Rani Prayag Kumari Debi, 1940 I.T.R. 25, following Simpson v. Maurice's Executors, 14 Tax Cases 580.

In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Narayanan Chettiar, 1943 I.T.R. 47, the Madras High Court declined to follow Beharilal Bhargava v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., 1941 I.T.R. 9 (All.); but followed Schulze v. Bensted, 7 Tax Cases, 30 and Inland Revenue v. Barnato, 20 Tax Cases 445, in holding that interest allowed by panchayatdars on the amounts due to certain minors from a partnership, of which their father had been a member, was not damages for wrongful detention of money.

Discounted Bills.—A payment to a Bank in respect of a discounted bill drawn in the ordinary course of trade in selling goods which the drawer is unable to meet is not a capital loss but a trading loss. Similarly, any repayment by the Bank on account of such a transaction is a trading receipt and not a capital receipt, Bernhard v. Gahan, 12 Tax Cases 723; 7 A.T.C. 102.

Compensation—Cancelled contracts.—To decide whether compensation for cancelled contracts is capital or revenue, one must look at the intrinsic nature of the business. In the course of business one enters into a great number of contracts, some of which are fulfilled, some broken and others terminated. So long as the assessee has no less power than other persons to terminate his contracts upon terms mutually acceptable, e.g., if he does not enter into a restrictive covenant preventing him from undertaking other contracts, the compensation for closing a contract is merely the price paid for immediate freedom in the course of business from the responsibility for executing the particular contracts and not the price received as compensation for a burden thrown on the assessee not to carry on the trade. It was held accordingly that the compensation received by a ship-builder for the cancellation of contracts to build certain ships was not a capital receipt, Short Bros. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue and Sunderland Shipbuilding Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 955; 136 L.T. 689.

See also John Smith & Sons v. Moore, 12 Tax Cases 266; (1921) 2 A.C. 13 and other rulings set out under section 10 (2) (xii).

Following Hall v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1921) 3 K.B. 152; 12 Tax Cases 382, Sargant, L.J., said in Short Bros. case, 12 Tax Cases 955: "You cannot stop at one definite period and say: 'Here was a contract; the contract must be looked upon as an equivalent to the sale or purchase of an annuity, payable at fixed dates, of a definite amount, and therefore any sum received in lieu of the contract being carried out must be looked at as a capital sum received for the surrender of the annuity'".

A building company received a lump sum as compensation from a landowner, for the latter's having withdrawn from the building scheme of the company a large number of the plots which he had agreed to allow to be built upon. It was held that the lump sum was a trading receipt because land was the stock-in-trade of the company, and a right to build on a plot was as much a trading asset as the land itself, Shadbolt v. Salmon Estates, 1943 K.B.D.

In another case, the assesseees who were chalk merchants and owned quarries entered into a contract to supply chalk to a person for ten years and had under the contract to have a wharf for the loading of chalk. The quantity to be supplied each year was to be varied between a minimum and a maximum. The contract was subsequently cancelled and the assesseees received compensation which they used for writing down the value of the wharf on their books. The wharf was not required for their other business. There was no lease of the wharf, and the sums were not paid in respect of the wharf at all. Held, following the case of Short Bros. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that the compensation was really a new form of profit in lieu of that under the contract and therefore a trading receipt and not a capital receipt, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Northfleet Coal and Ballast Co., 6 A.T.C. 1030; 12 Tax Cases 1102.

The compensation paid for the detention of ships during a coal strike by the Customs under orders of the Ministry of Shipping for a period of 15 days was considered to be taxable even though there was no formal chartering or requisitioning of ships by Government. The assessee claimed that the compensation was in the nature of damages for personal injury to a professional man. The ratio-decidendi was that the compensation was really in the nature of payment for the time and profit lost by the vessels during their detention. The Glenboig Case was distinguished on the ground that in that case the compensation was for the sterilisation of the source of income, Ensign Shipping Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (C. of A.), 7 A.T.C. 130; 12 Tax Cases 1169; 138 L.T. 180.

An assessee purchased a vessel which required overhauling and certain replacements before it could be used. The repairers delayed delivery and paid compensation for the delay. The compensation was held to be taxable on the ground that the profits of a shipper include not only freight but payments in lieu thereof, the compensation in this case being in lieu of the freight which the ship would have carried. The compensation was of the nature of demurrage and not like damages for running down or sinking the vessel and the temporary sterilisation of the source of income did not involve a capital loss but only loss of its use as a freight-earning source. Damages which go to fill a 'hole' in profits are trading receipts while those which go to fill a 'hole' in capital assets are not; and the measure by which damages are ascertained is no clue as to the capital or revenue nature of the damages. Lord Sands suggested that if the assessee had had to pay a certain fixed sum for repairs to make the ship seaworthy with an abatement for delay, the abatement might have been a capital saving instead of a Revenue receipt, Burma Steamship Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 67. While compensation received for cancellation of a contract in the ordinary course of business is taxable, the taxability of compensation received for the termination of a pooling arrangement has given rise to considerable divergence of opinion. In the leading case on the subject, Van den Berghs, Ltd. v. Clark, 19 Tax Cases 390; (1935) A.C. 431, the High Court held that the compensation was of the nature of capital. The Court of Appeal held otherwise but the House of Lords restored the decision of the lower Court. The agreements which the appellants consented to cancel were not ordinary commercial contracts made in the course of their trade; they were not contracts for the disposal of their products or for engagement of agents or for employees necessary for the conduct of business nor were they agreements as to how the profits, when earned, should be distributed as between the contracting parties. On the contrary the cancelled agreements related to the whole structure of the appellant's profit-making apparatus. They regulated the appellants' activities, defined what they might and what they might not do and affected the whole question of their business. Further, even if the magnitude of the transaction, which is not an entirely irrelevant consideration, be ignored, the congeries of rights which the appellants enjoyed under the agreements and which they surrendered for a price was a capital asset. The criterion of distinction between fixed and circulating capital which the Court of Appeal applied is not helpful. The agreements formed the fixed framework within which the circulating capital operated: they were not incidental to the profit-making machine but were essential parts thereof. They provided the means of making profits but did not themselves yield profits, the profits arising from manufacturing and dealing in margarine. That being so, the appellants could not be said to have turned over the asset of the agreements.

In applying Short Bros. case, 12 Tax Cases 955 or Van den Berghs Case, 19 Tax Cases, 390; (1935) A.C. 431, one has to see how far the structure of the business is designed to absorb such shocks as the cancellation of a single, albeit important, agency contract. So, when an agent who represented several principals who changed from time to time and whose contracts with the respective principals also changed from time to time, lost an important agency by its being terminated a year before the due date, the compensation received in respect of such premature termination was held to be income. The agency agreements were, in the circumstances of the case, temporary and variable elements and not the fixed framework of the agent's profit-making enterprise, Kelsall parsons & Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 17 A.T.C. 87 (C.S.).

The most important criterion in all such cases is whether what is injured or lost is a capital asset or its income. In a company whose business is to acquire licences to produce plays, each licence is not a separate capital asset, but is part of the stock in trade; and any expenditure on such licences would be a charge against the profits; so also, any compensation for damages must come in as profits and not as capital receipts, Vanghan v. Archie Parnell, Ltd., 1942 I.T.R. 37 (Sup.). A company D introduced company M to company R for the supply of goods to company R, and was entitled under an agreement to receive from M a commission on the goods so supplied. Later on, M paid roughly the equivalent of three year's commission to D who agreed to cancel the original agreement. It was held that the lump sum so received was taxable as profits of D. The test is not whether the contract was usual or unusual, but whether it is of a trading nature, i.e., revenue nature. No money was spent to secure it in this case, no capital asset was acquired to carry it out; and its cancellation was only an ordinary method of modifying it and realising the profit from it. Shove v. Duna Manufacturing Co., 1942 I. T. R. (Sup.) 150. A company requiring chlorine for the manufacture of magnesium contemplated setting up its own plant for making chlorine but was persuaded not to do so by another company making chlorine. The first company was to take chlorine from the second at £10 per ton but at the same time, under another contract was to receive £7½ per ton as compensation for loss of profit in not setting up its own plant. The Special Commissioners held that the receipt of £7½ a ton was not a trading receipt but their view was not accepted. Magnesium Electron Co v. Thompson, 1944 (C.A.).

The Government who controlled the works of certain assesseees during the Great War allowed them to go on with their business but merely restricted buying and selling prices. Compensation was paid to the assesseees on account of the deficiency of profits below a certain normal standard. Held, that the compensation was not a capital receipt but the income of the assesseees' business, Charles Brown & Co v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 9 A.T.C. 15 (C.A.); 12 Tax Cas. 1256. In another case, in which compensation was received for cancellation of contracts to purchase yarn from the assessee and also a sum in settlement of a claim for damages for a breach of a similar contract, both the sums were held to be trading receipts, Jesse Robinson & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 A.T.C. 125; 12 Tax Cas. 1241.

A Greyhound Racing Association acquired the lease of a track and made losses. A receiver took possession on behalf of debenture holders and hired the track to another company for a long period the rent being fixed at 15 per cent. of the gross takings (subject to certain minimum). The lessee company wanted to go into voluntary liquidation and the receiver of the lessor company agreed to the surrender of the lease only if a new company was formed to take over the lease and also the old lessee company paid the lessor company a lump actuarially equal to the difference between the rent payable by the old company and that by the new one. It was held that the lump sum was taxable being paid for the use of a capital asset. Mallett v. Staveley Coal Co., 13 Tax Cases 772 was distinguished on the ground that in that case the sums paid for surrender were for getting rid of onerous assets once for all while in this case, the user of the track—no matter by whom—could not create a capital asset and the original asset, i.e., the track continued to be the property of the lessor. The case was therefore similar to Short Bros. Case, 12 Tax Cases 955. It was also different from Van den Bergh's Case, 19 Tax Cases 390; (1935) A.C. 431, since the agreement in it did not relate to the whole of the lessor's business nor was it a fundamental organisation of his activities, like the pooling in the other case. The payment of a percentage of gross receipts was only a means of settling the rent to be paid and there was nothing to prevent the lessor company from acquiring other assets or from carrying on business in connection with such assets, Greyhound Racing Association v. Cooper, (1936) 2 A.E.R. 742; 20 Tax Cases 373 (K.B.).

In Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. v. Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cas. 427, the company received damages on account of expenditure incurred by it in keeping open the mine during the period when it was restrained from working the mine, pending final settlement. The Court of Session, by a majority, held that the damages were not trading profits but recoupment of cost of protecting capital assets which subsequently turned out to be unproductive. The dissentient view was that the restraint did not reduce the capital value of the asset, but only the trading profits. The point was not considered by the House of Lords, since, by agreement between the parties, a part of the damages was treated as trading receipts. The expenditure had been debited in the accounts to Revenue and the damages when received had also been credited to that head.

A private company of chemicals merchants dealing in industrial chemicals entered into a contract for the purchase of agricultural chemicals from a manufacturer who gave them a monopoly for a particular territory. For this purpose, the company set up a new sales organisation. After some time, the contract was cancelled, and a lump sum received by the company as compensation. It was claimed on behalf of the company that the selling of industrial and of agricultural chemicals formed two separate businesses, that the cancellation of the contract destroyed the whole of the business in agricultural chemicals, that the contract had not only created a new source of supply but a new market, and that in view of the monopoly given to the company in the specific territory, the contract was a capital asset to it. Lawrence, J. negatived all these claims. The case was nearer to Short Bros. Case, 12 Tax Cas. 955 than to Van den Bergh's Case, 19 Tax Cases 390. The compensation represented the profits that might have been made under the contract, had it continued, and not the purchase price of the contract. The structure of the company's business was not altered by the cancellation of the contract; and the company could always have sold agricultural chemicals and could still do so. The exclusion of competition is a common incident in such contracts, and is not analogous to a pooling arrangement, Bush, Beach and Gent, Ltd. v. Road, 1939 L.J.K.B. 801. Henderson v. King Meade Robinson, 17 A.T.C. 241, was distinguished on the ground that in that case money had been lent to secure a sole agency, and the loss on the loan was thus a capital loss. Here, on the other hand, no money was paid to secure the contract, and the compensation was not a repayment of money.

Compensation—Loss of agency.—It was held by the Calcutta High Court that compensation received by a company for the loss of one of the managing agencies held by it was income assessable under section 12 not being exempt under section 4 (3) (vii), Turner Morrison & Co., Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 56 Cal. 211; 3 I.T.C. 214; but this ruling was distinguished by the same High Court later as being based on the peculiar facts of the case. In the next case of this kind before that Court, in which a lump sum was paid to an employee by his employer in satisfaction of a claim by the employee that he was a partner in the employer's business, which however was not admitted by the employer and which formed the subject-matter of a pending civil suit between the two, it was held that the lump sum was a capital receipt. Section 4 (3) (vii) does not apply to such cases since the payment arises out of business. But it is not 'income' at all within the meaning of section 3 or 4, In re Mundy, 57 Cal. 1330; A.I.R. 1930 Cal. 625.

The Calcutta ruling in Turner Morrison's case was overruled by the Privy Council in Shaw Wallace & Co.'s case, 59 I.A. 206, see also rulings set out under section 4 (3) (vii) regarding compensation for loss of office.

A suit by an employee for breach of his service agreement was settled on terms "that he received the sum of . . . as agreed damages and the defendants withdrew the counter-claim". The Commissioners dissected the lump sum into two parts representing respectively salary (with commission), i.e., income and true damages, i.e., capital. Finlay, J., held that there was no evidence to justify such a finding, George du Cros v. Ryall, 19 Tax Cases 444 (K.B.).

If a transaction per se gives rise neither to "salary" (section 7), nor profits (section 10), nor 'income' (section 12), e.g., a restrictive covenant, the mere fact that compensation is paid over several years in instalments will not make the payments 'income', even if the payments were contingent on events from time to time, e.g., the conduct of the payee, Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind v. Mill Stores Co., 1941 I.T.R. 642. The facts of the case, however, were peculiar; and if the payee whose agency had been terminated had not received cash but accepted the alternative of a limited commission agency the decision might have been different.

Stock—Purchase of—Undervaluation.—A company acquired for £25,000 the assets of another company in liquidation. The assets stood in the books of the latter at £75,000. The £25,000 was apportioned between various items, £5,625 being taken against stock. Stock was taken and the actual value was found to be £12,798. The question was whether this difference between £12,798 and £5,625 was taxable as profit.

Held, by the Scottish Court of Session that the difference was not taxable, as no one could tell what was the exact price paid for each asset and there was only one alternative so far as stock was concerned, viz., its real value, Craig (Kilmarnock), Ltd. v. Cowperthwaite, (1914) 13 Tax Cases 627.

Debts taken over at succession to a business.—In cases of succession where the successor takes over the predecessor's business as a going concern, it is a matter of considerable importance whether particular items taken over represent accrued debts or merely executory contracts. In Dailuaine-Talisker Distilleries v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 15 Tax Cases 613; (1930) S.C. 878, it was held that the successor was taxable in respect of accrued rents taken over from the predecessor. In this case, there was a minimum period for which rent was payable by tenants and till the end of that period, rent could not be demanded. Moreover, when rent was eventually payable, deductions for damages (on account of deficiency of spirit warehoused) could be claimed by the tenants. For these reasons, it was held that what was taken over by the successor was only a number of executory contracts. On the other hand, in the case of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Oban Distillery Co., 18 Tax Cases 33; (1933) S.C. 44, the tenants not only acknowledged the debts due from them as correct to the successor at the time of transfer but immediately paid the rents, and it was held that the successor was not taxable in respect of these rents which formed part of the capital assets purchased. In a third case the facts of which fell between the two, the tenants acknowledged the correctness of the accrued rents on the date of transfer but the successor financed and granted credit to the customers who actually paid the accrued rents much later. It was considered that this postponement did not alter the true nature of the debt which was a non-revenue asset including no element of profit or loss, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Arthur Bell & Sons, 17 A.T.C. 563 (C.S.). See also In re Bissendayal Dayaram, 1938 I.T.R. 165 (Cal.), referred to under section 10 (2) (xii)—Capital expenditure—Transfer of business.

Rent dependent on capital and interest.—A local authority raised a loan and purchased a tramway. The loan was repayable in half-yearly instalments with interest spread over thirty years. The tramway was leased to another local authority for such a rent as should enable the lessors to repay the principal and interest of the loan in thirty years. The lessees claimed that they could deduct income-tax from the payments made by them whereas the lessors claimed that the net payment due to them after deduction of tax, if any, was such a sum as would repay the loan in thirty years. Held, that the contention of the lessees was correct, Poole Corporation v. Bournemouth Corporation, (1910) 103 L.T. 828, that is to say, the payments were income and not repayments of capital in instalments.

A colliery company agreed to supply water to a local authority and erected the necessary works according to the designs, etc., of the latter. The company received (a) a lump sum, (b) an annual payment of 1/30th of the capital cost of the works, (c) interest on outstanding capital, and (d) a penny per thousand gallons of water. The agreement was to run for 30 years (with option of renewal on modified terms) when the works became the property of the company, but, if the company ceased to work, the local authority could take permission and pump the water. Held, by the Court of Appeal that item (b) was repayment of capital expenditure and neither taxable in the hands of the company nor deductible from the profits of the local authority, Boyce v. Whitwick Colliery Co., and Coalville Urban District Council v. Boyce, 18 Tax Cases 655; 151 L.T. 464.

Debenture—Trust deed—Payment of interest—Whether capital or income.—Under a debenture trust deed arrears of interest had to be paid before the principal. A debenture-holder having commenced an action, the Court directed that the trusts should be given effect to. The rates of interest on the debentures varied. The Court distributed the funds from time to time to the debenture-holders in proportion to the amounts due to them for interest. These funds consisted of rent and royalties from which income-tax had been already deducted. Afterwards the assets were sold and the Court was asked to make a final distribution. It was contended that the payments already made to the debenture-holders were payments of capital. Held, by Farwell, J., that as the debenture-holders did not possess the same interests and the deeds provided for payment of interest before principal, the debenture-holders could not waive their rights under that provision in the absence of agreement of all the debenture-holders, although the provision was inserted in the deed for the benefit of the debenture-holders, and that the payments made must be in accordance with the terms of the deed and that income-tax must be deducted from such payments as had not already borne the tax, Re Queensland and Coal Co.: Davis v. Martin, (1903) unreported.

In another case of a debenture trust deed in which there had been similar default and the Court had ordered the carrying into execution of the trusts it was held on the facts of the case and on the construction of the orders directing payment that, as it was clearly to the benefit of the debenture-holders that the payments should be appropriated to principal, they ought to be so appropriated without putting the payees to their election and that no income-tax should be deducted, Smith v. Law Guarantee and Trust Society, (1904) 2 Ch. 569 (C.A.).

Grants-in-aid.—A grant-in-aid received by a trading body from Government for a specific purpose (relief of unemployment) is not received as part of the trade and it is irrelevant for the purpose of taxation whether the money is spent on works of a Capital or of a Revenue nature. It is not conceivable that Government intend a part of such grants-in-aid to return to the Exchequer as tax, Seaham Harbour Dock Co. v. Crook, 16 Tax Cases 333 (H.L.). This does not, however, mean that a subsidy paid by Government is never to be taxed. Under the British Sugar Subsidy Act, the subsidy had to be repaid if the relevant "market" price exceeded a certain "basic" price or if the payee went into liquidation or wound-up his business. Finlay, J. held that the subsidy was of the nature of a loan while the Court of Appeal held that it was a final grant and taxable, since the contingency to repay in certain events could be discounted and allowed for in ascertaining profits. In confirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, the House of Lords observed that the question did not turn on verbal arguments based on the statute regulating the subsidy but on the substance of the transaction which was that the company received sums which were intended to be used and could properly have been used to meet its current trading obligations. Moreover, the contingency of possible repayment did not in fact arise, Smart v. Lincolnshire Sugar Co., Ltd., 20 Tax Cases 643; 1937 A.E.R. 413; 53 T.L.R. 306.

Provided that there shall not be included in any assessment for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1940, both the amount of the income, profits and gains referred to in sub-clause (ii) of clause (b) and the amount of the income, profits and gains referred to in sub-clause (iii) of clause (b) but only the greater of these two amounts:

Provided further that, in the case of a person not ordinarily resident in British India, income, profits and gains which accrue or arise to him without British India shall not be so included unless they are derived from a business, controlled in or a profession or vocation set up in India or unless they are brought into or received in British India by him during such year:

Provided further that if in any year the amount of income accruing or arising without British India exceeds the amount brought into British India in that year, there shall not be included in the assessment of the income of that year so much of such excess as does not exceed four thousand five hundred rupees.

Explanation 1.—Income, profits and gains accruing or arising without British India shall not be deemed to be received in or brought into British India within the meaning of this subsection by reason only of the fact that they are taken into account in a balance-sheet prepared in British India.

Explanation 2.—Income which would be chargeable under the head 'Salaries' if payable in British India and not being pension payable without India shall be deemed to accrue or arise in British India wherever paid if it is earned in British India.

Explanation 3.—A dividend paid without British India shall be deemed to be income accruing and arising in British India to the extent to which it has been paid out of profits subjected to income-tax in British India.

(2) For the purposes of sub-section (1), where a husband is not resident in British India, remittances received by his wife resident in British India out of any part of his income which is not included in his total income shall be deemed to be income accruing in British India to the wife.

History.—For the corresponding provisions in previous Acts, see definition of "income" and sections 4 (1) and 7 (2) in the Act of 1886; and sections 3 (1) and 14 (1) of the 1918 Act.

The section has been amended several times since 1922 the most important occasions being (1) the extension, in 1933, of the liability to taxation, though only on a remittance basis, of all foreign income, whenever brought in (not only from business as before) and the exemption, in the same year, of agricultural income remitted from Indian States which had paid land revenue there, and (2) the radical alteration, in 1939, of the basis of taxation into one of residence.

Immediately before the amendment in 1939, the two sub-sections read as below:—

"4. (1) Save as hereinafter provided, this Act shall apply to all income, profits or gains, as described or comprised in section 6, from whatever source derived, accruing or arising, or received in British India, or deemed under the provisions of this Act to accrue, or arise, or to be received in British India

(2) Income, profits and gains accruing or arising without British India to a person resident in British India shall, if they are received in or brought into British India, be deemed to have accrued or arisen in British India and to be income, profits and gains of the year in which they are so received or brought notwithstanding the fact that they did not so accrue or arise in that year:

Provided that nothing contained in this sub-section shall apply to any income, profits or gains so accruing or arising prior to the first day of April, 1933, unless they are income, profits or gains of a business and are received in or brought into British India within three years of the end of the year in which they accrued or arose:

Provided further that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to income from agriculture arising or accruing in a State in India from land for which any annual payment in money or in kind is made to the State."

Explanation—in same terms as present Explanation (1).

Scope of this section.—The marginal note against section 3 is 'charge of income-tax' and that against section 4 is 'application of Act'. Section 3 defines who has to pay, i.e., every individual, company, etc., on what he has to pay, viz., the total income of the previous year; and at what rates, viz., the rates imposed by the Finance Act every year. Section 4 circumscribes the scope of section 3 by defining and limiting the nature of the income that may be included in total income of the previous year. Sections 7 to 13 regulate the computation of income.

The section contemplates three classes of assessee, viz., (1) Resident in British India, (2) Resident but not ordinarily so resident, and (3) Not resident in British India.

Class (1) is chargeable on, (a) their 'world' income subject, however, to a deduction of Rs. 4,500 of foreign income, not brought into British India and to the addition of foreign income that arose after 1st April, 1933, and was brought into British India after the assessment year 1939-40 (and had not been taxed).

Class (2) is chargeable on all British Indian income, both factual and deemed, and on foreign income from business, profession or vocation if controlled or set up in India (not British India) or if brought into British India, subject also to a deduction of Rs. 4,500 not brought into British India.

Class (3) is chargeable on British Indian income only, both factual and deemed.

Clause (a) of sub-section (1) referring to receipt in British India applies to all persons whether resident or not; clause (b) applies to residents and clause (c) to non-residents. The second proviso further differentiates between residents who are ordinarily resident and those who are not.

Subject to the provisions of this Act.—These words take the place of "save as hereinafter provided", and both the phrases mean practically the same thing and refer to exemption clauses like sections 4 (3), 60 and 14.

"Total income . . . includes".—While the section as it stood before used the words "this Act shall apply" section 4 (1) and "this Act shall not apply" [section 4 (3)], the present section uses the words, "the total income . . . includes" [section 4 (1)] and ". . . shall not be included in the total income" [section 4 (3)]. Here again there is no real change of substance, the new words being intended to bring out the intention more clearly and to avoid difficulties that might otherwise arise in respect of "total world income". In section 2 (15), however, which defines "total world income" the old words "Act does not apply" have been used.

It had been held with reference to the old section that income to which the Act does not apply shall not be taken into account for any purpose under the Act, see per Krishnan, J., in Board of Revenue, Madras v. Arunachalam Chetty, 44 Mad. 65; 1 I.T.C. 75, 89. On the other hand, the income to which the Act applies could be taken into account for some purpose or other defined in the Act, e.g., it may be taken into account merely in fixing the rate of tax—see section 16.

Includes.—Obviously means "means and includes" having regard to the structure of sub-sections (1) and (3).

Previous year.—See section 2 (11) and notes under it.

Person.—The special definition in section 2 (9) expands the definition in the General Clauses Act, so as to cover a Hindu undivided family and a local authority, but it appears to fail to cover an association of persons, since the definition in the General Clauses Act refers only to an association of individuals. On the other hand, in section 3 reference has been made, not to associations of individuals but to those of persons.

Conditions in clauses alternative.—The successive use of the word 'or' will make it clear that the fulfilment of each of the conditions by itself will result in the inclusion of the item in total income, if it does not fall under a proviso or an exempting provision.

On behalf of.—This phrase has been used in clause (a) of sub-section (1) which evidently refers to the occasion of receipt for the first time, but not in other clauses nor even in the second proviso referring to remittances. See however notes below as regards Constructive remittance of foreign income.

Resident.—See section 4-A and notes thereunder.

Accrue or Arise to him.—See notes below and rulings.

Deemed to accrue, etc., and deemed to be received.—See following Explanations (2) and (3) and sub-section (2) of this section, sub-section (2) of section 7, sections 16, 18 (4), 41, 42, 44-D et seq., 49-B and 49-C and also sections 2 (6-A), 2 (6-C), 10 (2) (vi) and (xii) and 23-A.

First proviso.—The proviso applies only to the assessment for the year 1939-40. In the assessments of later years items already taxed under clause (b) (ii), i.e., foreign income as it accrued from time to time, will presumably not be taxed again in a later year under clause (b) (iii), when brought into British India, on the recognised principle, though not laid down in the statute in express terms, that the same income cannot be taxed twice in the hands of the same assessee. But foreign income which accrued after 1st April, 1939, and was not taxed for any reason will, when brought into British India in a year later than in the assessment for 1939-40, be taxed in addition to the fresh foreign income accrued and taxed in that year at higher rates on the two blocks of income taken together.

An important exception to the above plan was made by the amendment of sections 14 and 17 in 1941, in respect of income arising in Indian states to residents of British India. Under these sections now, such income is not ordinarily taxed unless it is brought into British India though it is included in total income (i.e., for determining the rate of tax on other blocks of income), and when brought in, is taxed on an ad hoc and somewhat arbitrary and complicated basis.

The first proviso applies only to a resident since it qualifies clause (b) only. Obviously the proviso is to be applied with due reference to the other two provisos.

Second proviso.—The proviso is evidently intended to be an exception to items (ii) and (iii) of clause (b) of the sub-section, for these are the only two cases under which, but for the proviso, liability for tax in respect of income accruing or arising to the person outside British India would arise. That being so, since clause (b) applies only to a resident, this proviso also applies only to residents; that is to say, the person contemplated by the proviso is a person resident, but not ordinarily resident, in the relevant year. So, for the purpose of this section, we are really concerned with only three classes of tax-payers, viz., (a) resident and also ordinarily resident, (b) resident but not ordinarily resident, and (c) non-resident irrespective of his ordinary residence.

Three conditions have to be satisfied if the income in question is to be excluded, viz., (a) the person is not ordinarily resident in British India; as to this, see section 4-B; (b) the income does not arise from a business [i.e., as defined in section 2 (4)] controlled in or a profession or vocation set up in India (not British India); and (c) the income has not been received in or brought into British India.

As to what is 'business', see section 2 (4), and more particularly notes as to the meaning of the words "in the nature of trade"; and as to 'profession', see notes under section 4 (3) (vii).

The "such year" in the proviso refers back to the "previous year", jumping across the first proviso.

As to what constitutes bringing into or receipt in British India, see notes below under Remittances. What is brought in should be taxable income, i.e., not capital or income falling under section 4 (3) and therefore exempt.

While the words 'on his behalf' appear in clause (a) they do not appear in this proviso, but, in view of the various rulings on constructive remittances, receipt in or bringing into British India on behalf of an assessee would presumably be considered equivalent to receipt or bringing in by him. See however explanation to proviso to section 45 which restricts that explanation only for the purposes of that section, viz., postponement of collection of tax.

Third proviso.—This proviso also, for the same reasons as have been explained in respect of the first and second provisos, applies only to a resident. This proviso must be read with reference to the other two provisos; that is to say, (a) the foreign income referred to is such income as is taxable under the second proviso and (b) for the year 1939-40, the first proviso also should be applied.

"In any year" refers clearly to the 'previous year'. The words 'to him' have been left out after 'accruing or arising'. The amount brought into British India in a particular year has not been qualified and need not therefore necessarily be out of the foreign profits which accrued in the same year. So, if (say) Rs. 50,000 accrues in a year and Rs. 60,000 is brought in (including earlier taxed profits), the tax will be on Rs. 50,000. If next year (say) Rs. 60,000 accrues and Rs. 50,000 is brought in, the tax will be on Rs. 55,500. The concession of excluding Rs. 4,500 can be enjoyed every year.

This proviso is 'subject to the provisions of this Act' (at the beginning of the section), which includes section 23; that section makes it clear that a registered firm has to be assessed as such first, and that the liability of the partners arises later. So, the allowance of Rs. 4,500 is to be given to the firm as such and not to each of the partners. Mohanlal Hiralal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 1943 I.T.R. 259. If the partner has other foreign income, he can, it is considered, claim the balance of the allowance if otherwise eligible to it.

The words 'shall not be included in the assessment of the income' merely mean 'shall be excluded from total income.' Therefore, foreign income whether in an Indian state or elsewhere, which is not brought into British India, is to be left out of the picture altogether up to a limit of Rs. 4,500 both for rate and liability to tax.

Clause (b) (iii) and the second proviso use the words "brought into" and "received in" as alternatives while the third proviso uses only "brought into". The words "brought into" refer to income already received abroad, while "received in" refer to income accrued outside but received, for the first time itself not outside but within British India. Since the object of the proviso is to exempt a part of the income that does not come into British India, there is no need to refer specially to receipt in British India, as distinguished from bringing in.

Where foreign profits are frozen.—See proviso to section 45 and explanation thereto, which permit the postponement of collection of tax on foreign income which cannot be brought into British India.

Incorporation in accounts of foreign profits—Explanation 1.—This is the same as the explanation to old sub-section (2). It embodies the substance of several well-known decisions including that of the House of Lords in Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, 4 Tax Cases 464, (1901) 1 K.B. 153. See however, notes below in respect of Foreign Remittances.

Salaries—Explanation 2.—It will be seen from the rulings under the old section (see notes on the words 'Accrue' or 'Arise') that the position in regard to tax on salaries was obscure; and this new explanation clause seeks to make it clear that, barring pensions payable outside India (not British India), the basis of liability to the extent that it depends on that of accrual is that of income being earned in British India. Overseas pay, paid in sterling in the United Kingdom to Government Servants working in British India, had all along been taxed in British India on this view. Pension payable without India—whether Government or other pension—has been exempted unless it can be taxed on the basis of ordinary residence. This is in accordance with the decision of the Lahore High Court in Sir T. Vijayaraghavacharya's case, (1936) I.T.R. 317, under the old section. 'Payable' evidently means 'payable under the contract or other conditions of service'. It should be noted that the pension should be payable outside India. If it is paid in an Indian State, it will be deemed to arise in British India.

The salary of an individual working outside British India cannot be said to be earned in British India especially if it is also paid outside British India; so, it will not be deemed to accrue or arise in British India except to the extent covered by section 7 (2), but leave pay and salary for work done in British India will be deemed to accrue in British India wherever paid. Salary for work done outside India, and paid outside India, will be taxable if paid to a resident of British India who is also ordinarily resident but not if he is not ordinarily resident, for ex hypothesi the vocation is not set up in India. If the work is done in an Indian State and payment made there, sections 14 and 17 will apply.

Explanation 3.—The object of this provision is to render liable to super-tax dividends paid outside British India from profits subjected to income-tax in British India. Otherwise on the principle of Commissioner of Income-tax v. Goldie, 5 I.T.C. 228, 55 Bom. 734; A.I.R. 1931 Bom. 420, the income in the shareholders' hands would be held to accrue outside British India. The income, by virtue of this explanation, not only becomes liable to super-tax but is eligible for refund under section 48. The word 'dividend' should be read with reference to the special definition in section 2 (6-A).

It was held by the Federal Court in Governor-General in Council v. Raleigh Investments, 1944 I.T.R. 265 that this explanation clause is not beyond the powers of the Indian legislature as laid down in the Government of India Act, 1935. The source of income in such a case is the profits made in British India. The unsuccessful argument to the contrary was that such dividends being payable abroad under foreign contracts, are, if paid to non-residents, beyond the ambit of taxability by the Indian legislature.

Where a part only of the profits of the Company is taxed in British India only a proportion of the dividend can be deemed to accrue in British India. The extent to which a dividend paid abroad is paid out of profits subjected to Income-tax in British India is a question of fact; and the general principle of Rule 33 would be applied in such cases.

The words 'subjected to tax' should be noted. If no tax is actually payable by the company but nevertheless, the company pays a dividend, e.g., out of taxed profits of earlier years or out of capital appreciation, such dividend would appear to be outside the scope of this explanation.

Remittances from husband to wife—Sub-section (2).—The husband should be non-resident, the wife resident (section 4-A) and the remittances made out of the husband's income [section 2 (6-C)] but not included in his own 'total income' [section 4 (1)], before this sub-section can come into operation. The reverse case of a remittance from a wife abroad to a husband in British India is not covered.

Income, profits and gains.—See notes under sections 2 (6-C), 3, 4 (3) (vii), and 10 (2) (vi) and (xi). Capital receipts are excluded except those covered by section 2 (6-C).

From whatever source derived.—The evident object is merely to refer to the sources in section 6 and in this view the words "from whatever source derived" are mere surplusage.

Accrue or arise—Meaning of.—Having regard to the use of the word 'received' also in this section, the words 'accrue and arise' obviously refer to a stage earlier than receipt. There are at least four different elements in the concept 'accrue'—(1) that of time; (2) that of place; (3) that of source; and (4) that of the person to whom the income accrues.

The element of time arises principally in deciding when income should be taxed. This question is dealt with in the notes under section 13. See, however, notes below as regards remittances from abroad. Once income has accrued, that is, assuming that the "time" factor has been solved, the liability to tax is determined by the other three factors only. In practice, however, it is more usual to settle the liability to tax with reference to the other three factors and then consider the 'time' element when computing the income liable.

If 'accrue in' a place means to be derived from a source in or earned in that place there is no separate element of source to be considered. The two elements of place and source merge into one. But if the phrase means something like a right to receive the income in that place and nothing else, and has no reference to the material origin or the source of the income, the place of accrual may not be the place where the income originates or is earned.

In all cases, wherever and whenever income may accrue, it must accrue to some person who is the person sought to be taxed.

Section 4 (1) as it stood before, did not require the income to accrue to the assessee in British India. All that it required was that the income should accrue or arise or be received in British India or be deemed to accrue, etc., before it could be taxed. It was the same thing whether the person to whom the income accrues was a resident or not except in certain cases in which income was deemed to accrue, etc., in British India. In this respect the law in India differed radically from the English law. The question was what was meant by accrual in a place. Did accrual merely mean receivability in that place or did it involve the income either being earned in that place or being derived from a source of income situated in that place?

The arguments in support of the former construction were the following:—(1) The words “from whatever source derived” became surplusage if they merely referred to the sources described in section 6. The only meaning to be given to these words, if we were not to treat them as surplusage, was to construe them as referring to sources both within and outside British India. (2) Section 42 as it stood then contemplated the “accrual,” outside British India (unless the income accrued outside, there would be no object in “deeming” it to accrue inside), of income to a non-resident, from “business connection” or “property” in British India. Even “business connection”—whatever it may mean—clearly connotes that the source of income is not actually or wholly in British India but has either some connection with British India or lies partly in British India. Again though the word ‘property’ in section 42 (1) is not limited by its special meaning in section 9, it should be something tangible and situate in British India as laid down by the Privy Council in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Currimbhoy Ebrahim & Sons, Ltd., 60 Bom. 172; A.I.R. 1936 P.C. 1; 63 I.A. 1; 1935 I.T.R. 395. (3) Section 4 (2) as it stood also suggested that “accruing” referred to receivability rather than to the place or origin. Incidentally, this was the official view in regard to interest on securities payable abroad.

On the other hand, (1) sub-section (2a) of section 18 clearly assumes that salaries payable to a Government servant out of India by or on behalf of Government were taxable, i.e., they ‘accrued’ or ‘arose’ in British India within the meaning of section 4 (1). (2) The fact that pay, leave salaries and pensions paid out of India by the Government of India were exempted under section 60 showed by implication that they were taxable. (3) The more natural meaning of ‘accrue’ or ‘arise,’ and more particularly the latter, when used only with reference to a place and without reference to a person or source, is to connote something springing up from the place, i.e., from a source in it—see the authorities cited in the judgment of Oldfield, J., in Board of Revenue v. Ramanathan Chetti, 1 I.T.C. 37; 43 Mad. 75. The idea of “receivability” is less natural and is usually imposed only by the necessity of the context in construing a particular Act or Acts, as in the United Kingdom; the words there are “accruing or arising to a person” see Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490. (4) While in the English Acts the words used are “accruing or arising,” the corresponding words in the Indian Act were “accruing or arising or received”. Income which is receivable in India would ordinarily be received there and the words “accruing or arising” may therefore be considered to have no reference to receivability.

The words 'accrue' and 'arise' had been construed in other countries but these rulings could not be followed in India on account of the difference not only in the wording but in the structure of the Acts. In Commissioners of Taxation v. Kirk (cited infra), a case from New South Wales, it was held by the Privy Council that "accrue" or "arise" meant the same as "derived", but the case was distinguished from English decisions on the ground that the language and aim of the United Kingdom statutes were different. In two New Zealand cases also—Commissioners of Taxes v. Lovell and Christmas and Commissioners of Taxes v. Eastern Extension, etc., Telegraph Co., (infra), "accrue" was held to mean the same as "derived". On the other hand, in the United Kingdom it was held in Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490—that "accrue" meant only a "right to receive" (per Fry, L.J., in the Court of Appeal—the judgment was reversed by the House of Lords on different grounds altogether). None of these decisions, as already stated, could be applied to India. In the Colonial cases the statutes used the word 'derived' more or less as a variant to 'accrue' or 'arise'; while in the English law the idea of accruing to a person resident in the United Kingdom is prominent.

The section as amended in 1939 makes a radical departure from the previous law. Not only is the new plan of taxation nearer to that under the English law, laying greater emphasis than before on residence, but even the new wording of the section makes a closer approach to that of the English law by using the words "accrue to a person" in British India or without British India instead of merely referring to accruing in or outside British India though, simultaneously the words "to a person" have been omitted in section 42 where they appeared formerly. Again Explanation 2 proceeds on the footing that the main basis of accrual in a place is its receivability there. On the other hand, the words used in the section now are different in several respects from those used in the English Law. For example taking a typical case (say) of a non-resident, the English Law taxes him on "profits . . . accruing" to him "from any property whatever in the United Kingdom or from any trade, profession, employment or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom."

Accruing to a person in British India is not the same as accruing to him from a trade, etc., in British India; therefore United Kingdom rulings cannot be followed in their entirety. Further, section 42 is so wide as to catch profits from trade with British India—not only trade in British India, though by executive instructions the scope of that section has been restricted. At the same time, many of the tests suggested by the rulings in the United Kingdom, e.g., as to place where trade is exercised, can be applied, e.g., to the place of accrual under the Indian Law—the tests being where contracts are made or services rendered.

Obviously there can be receipt of income at a single point of time or place, but accrual can be in stages; also income can be in kind, viz., 'moneys' worth', assuming of course a market, actual or possible, to enable 'kind' to be converted into cash. At each stage, if the income is taxable its value at that stage has somehow to be ascertained.

It is safe to say that there is no one single, conclusive test of what constitutes accrual of income—whether at a particular point of time or place.

If it is held that there is a material difference between 'accruing to a person in a place' and 'accruing in a place' the consequence is not so important now as it was before 1939; the result will merely be that the case will fall under section 42 instead of section 4. The question whether the source of income is in British India or not will arise only under section 42 and not under section 4, where all that has to be seen is whether the income accrues or arises or is received in British India or is deemed so to accrue or arise or be received—without regard to the location of the source, the words in section 4 being 'from whatever source derived'.

The word 'source' has not been defined in the Act nor been interpreted judicially. In a Rhodesian case, however, the Privy Council held that "a source was not a legal concept but something which a practical man would regard as a source of income", Rhodesia Metals Co. (in liquidation) v. Commissioner of Taxes, 1941 I.T.R. (Sup.) 45.

Decisions in India.—In India the meaning of the words 'accrue' and 'arise' as they stood in the law before 1939, has been considered in many cases, e.g., Commissioner of Income-tax v. Ramanathan Chetti, 43 Mad. 75; 1 I.T.C. 37—the point in issue being whether income from business abroad not remitted to British India "accrued" or "arose" in British India because the business was subject to general supervision by the owner from British India it was held that the income did not either accrue or arise in British India, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Arunachallam Chetti, 1 I.T.C. 75, (see section 13), in which the point was when income "accrued"; and Rogers Pyatt Shellac Co. v. Secretary of State, 52 Cal. 1; A.I.R. 1925 Cal. 34; 1 I.T.C. 363, (cited under section 42) relating to profits accruing to a non-resident from business connection in British India, in which M. N. Mookerjee, J., quoted with approval the meaning given in Colquhoun v. Brooks, but there are passages in his judgment which show that he inclined to the other view also. In Commissioner of Income-tax v. North Anantapur Gold Mines, 1 I.T.C. 133; 44 Mad. 718, however, in which the company contended that no profits arose or accrued in India because the sales were made in England and the money received there, the Madras High Court, while refusing a mandamus to ask the Commissioner to state a case on the ground that the High Court had no jurisdiction to do so, incidentally expressed the opinion that the profits had 'arisen' or 'accrued' in India, having regard to the difference in the wording of the Indian and the English Acts. On the other hand, it was held by the Lahore High Court in the case of Bhagat Jiwandas and others, 4 I.T.C. 40 that in the purchase of goods in British India for export no part of the profit accrues or arises in British India. See also In re the Aurangabad Mills, Ltd., 45 Bom. 1286; 1 I.T.C. 116 and Board of Revenue v. Ripon Press and Sugar Mills, 46 Mad. 706; A.I.R. 1923 Mad. 574; 1 I.T.C. 102 in both of which, notwithstanding the location of the head office and the control in British India, it was held that the income accrued or arose outside British India. These decisions, however, do not decide as between the 'earned' (or 'derived') theory and the 'receivability' theory. In Rogers Pyatt Shellac Co. v. Secretary of State, A.I.R. 1925 Cal. 34; 1 I.T.C. 363; 52 Cal. 1; Chatterjee, J., thought it "possible to conceive of cases where a property may be situate in British India and the profits thereof may accrue or arise out of British India," i.e., favoured the receivability theory.

The Rangoon High Court held in the case of Commissioner of Income-tax v. Phra Phraisan Salarak, 6 Rang. 598; A.I.R. 1929 Rang. 1; 3 I.T.C.

237, that the remuneration paid in Siam to a Siamese official for service rendered in Burma is not income 'accruing' or 'arising' in British India. If it is the location of the source of income which has to be considered, the salary accrued or arose in Siam the Government of which paid the salary irrespective of where he worked; and if the place where the enforceable right to demand the income arises, also Bangkok. 'Employment' in British India is not a source; see also Pickles v. Foulsham, 9 Tax Cases 261; (1925) A.C. 458 (H.L.), in which even though the whole of the taxpayer's work lay outside the United Kingdom, it was held that the source of the income was not the employment but the money paid by the employer who paid it, and had to pay it, in the United Kingdom. It has also been held in the United Kingdom that, while the source of income in respect of a trade or profession is that trade or profession itself, the source of income from employment is the money paid under contract of employment; if this money is payable, and paid, abroad, it is a "possession out of the United Kingdom". The fact that a part of the work in respect of the employment has to be or is done in the United Kingdom will not in itself make the source of income one in that country, Bennett v. Marshall, 16 A.T.C. 377 (C.A.). The provisions of the United Kingdom Statutes in this respect, however, are somewhat different from those in India.

On the other hand it was held in In re Sounders; (the Lord Bishop of Lucknow); 54 All. 223; A.I.R. 1932 All. 151; 5 I.T.C. 454, that a gratuitous allowance payable in London from a private fund to the Bishop of Lucknow in his official capacity accrued or arose in British India, since the allowance depended on the Bishop's continuing in the See at Lucknow.

Similarly commission paid abroad to an employee of a tea estate in British India, when on leave abroad, in respect of a period served by him in British India and for services rendered in British India, has been held to accrue or arise in British India.

Per Costello, J.—" . . . when one gets down to the fundamental aspect of the matter we have to decide, it really resolves itself entirely into a question of fact, and one which in my view should be looked at and decided in the light of commonsense and plain thinking and not too much importance should be attached to, or emphasis laid upon, the niceties of verbal definition." 1937 I.T.R. at p. 231.

Per Panckridge, J.—" . . . the question whether any particular income, profits or gains accrue or arise in British India is a question of fact, and it is not practicable to formulate any precise test . . . it is not always enough that the income should be earned in British India in the sense that the assessee was in British India for a part of the period or all the period during which the income was earned. For example, it would not be right . . . to hold that a portion of the salary of an officer of the Mercantile Marine accrued or arose in British India, because for some portion of the period during which the salary was earned, the officer was serving in Indian waters. In this case the assessee is under a four years' whole-time agreement to serve, his employers on their Indian tea estates", In re Every, I.L.R. (1937) 2 Cal. 327; 41 C.W.N. 823; 1937 I.T.R. 216 (Cal.). In Phra Phraisarn Salarak's case, 6 Rang. 598; 3 I.T.C. 237, the officer, it should be noted could be called on to serve anywhere and the remuneration bore no relation to the employee's work in British India and was presumably paid out of the General Revenues of Siam. These facts distinguish it from Every's case.

In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Bombay Trust Corporation, 4 I.T.C. 312; 57 I.A. 49; 54 Bom. 216, the Bombay High Court held that interest on deposits made by a non-resident finance company with a resident accrued from business carried on by the non-resident in British India or from 'other sources' in British India (see section 6) even though the interest was payable outside British India; and the Privy Council agreed, with this view.

In Commissioner of Income-tax v. Raja Bahadur Bansilal, Motilal, 54 Bom. 460; A.I.R. 1930 Bom. 381; 4 I.T.C. 332 the same High Court held that the interest on a debt contracted and repayable in British India accrues in British India even though the interest may in fact be payable outside British India. The interest arises or springs from principal moneys invested in and repayable in British India; and the amount of such interest is calculated as a percentage on the principal moneys which constitute the source of the interest. The same High Court held in the case of Commissioner of Income-tax v. Sarupchand Hukumchand, 5 I.T.C. 108; A.I.R. 1931 Bom. 236; 55 Bom. 231, that the commission earned by a firm as secretaries, treasurers, and agents of a company registered outside British India and having mills outside it but having a shop within it to sell the mill products accrued in British India because of the sales through the shop even though the commission was payable and paid only outside British India under an agreement executed outside British India. The word "source" can be interpreted in several ways like, for instance, the word 'cause' which may refer to the material cause, the final cause, the immediate cause and so on. In this case, one had to look to the material sources, viz., the shop rather than the metaphorical source, viz., the agreement regulating the commission. This decision was approved by the Privy Council in Chunilal B. Mehta's case, 1938 I.T.R. 521.

On the other hand, in an otherwise similar case in which the sales were made free on rails outside British India, hundis being drawn on British India for the sale proceeds and collected from the purchasers by the agents through their office in British India it was held that the commission arose from the sales which took place outside British India and not from the collection of the sale proceeds, the income therefore accrued outside British India. In re Hirralal Kalyanmal, 1943 I.T.R. 129 (Bom.).

According to the Privy Council, to answer the question, 'Do profits accrue or arise in British India' by asking another, viz. "What in the sense of section 6, is the source of the profits, and is it 'situate in British India'?" is to divert attention from that to which the statute points and to devote attention to what it discards. Nothing could be easier than to say "from whatever source derived, if situate in British India" had this been intended, but it would have been by no means easy to apply. The source of salaries, of interest on securities, of professional earnings is not readily described as situate anywhere though the place where employment is carried on, or an investment made or a salary or fees earned, is a familiar notion. There would have been no difficulty in the case of property, and with the aid of certain rules, little difficulty, it may be, in the case of business. But the Legislature has chosen a different test and applied it to all kinds of profits "accruing or arising in British India"; and it may even have chosen it as fairer because it could be applied distributively to the profits of a single source. What connection exists, if any, between the place of direction and the place at which profits arise is not touched by section 4 (as it stood before 1939), 6 or 10. Not only do they lay no stress on the place at which business is carried on, they do not even mention it. It cannot therefore, be held that it is itself the test of chargeability by virtue of a rule, nowhere mentioned in the Act, that profits accrue or arise at the place where the business is carried on.

That profits in respect of transactions abroad may depend largely on the knowledge, skill and judgment of the assessee in British India and on the instructions issued by him will not in itself make the profits from such transactions accrue or arise in British India, and for this purpose it is immaterial whether the business consists of dealing in goods or in mere differences. Even though a business may be a single organisation, it does not follow that all its profits should accrue or arise at the place of its control. The United Kingdom Acts impose a tax on those who "exercise a trade," in that country and rulings of Courts in that country do not furnish any guidance, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Chunnilal B. Mehta, I.L.R. 1938 Bom. 752; A.I.R. 1938 P.C. 232; (1938) I.T.R. 521 (P.C.) [confirming (1935) I.T.R. 376]. Where, however, a firm of brokers, etc., trading in Bombay entered into contracts in Bombay with another firm of brokers trading there and the profits or losses were payable in Bombay to either firm even though the transactions concerned were put through by the second firm with brokers in New York (but without any privity of contract between the first firm and the New York brokers) it was held that the profits accrued in British India, even though they were not actually paid but allowed to remain in New York, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Gorindram Seksaria, (1938) I.T.R. 584.

On the other hand in Major Goldie's case, 5 I.T.C. 228; 55 Bom. 754 the Bombay High Court held that a dividend paid by a company having its head office abroad to a shareholder not resident in British India was a debt payable by one non-resident to another and did not therefore accrue or arise in British India, even though the company did business there and paid tax. The source from which the debtor paid his debt was irrelevant, the source of the income from the creditor's point of view being the debt itself. This ruling has been nullified by Explanation 3 inserted in 1939 but the validity of that Explanation was questioned and affirmed by the Federal Court in Governor-General in Council v. Raleigh Investments, 1944 I.T.R. 265.

It has also been held that pension payable and paid outside India does not accrue in India even if paid out of Indian funds and in respect of service rendered in India. Pension is different from pay, and is merely a right to receive a certain sum of money annually at a particular place, Sir T. Vijayaraghavacharya v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1936) I.T.R. 317.

When tea was grown and manufactured outside British India but sold in it, it was held by the Calcutta High Court that the whole income accrued or arose in British India, In re Mohanpura Tea Company, Ltd., 1937 I.T.R. 118. A different view was taken by the Madras High Court in Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, (1937) I.T.R. 435, and the Privy Council to whom the latter case went on appeal, did not decide where the income accrued or arose. The case referred to coffee grown in Mysore, but dried and cured and sold in British India, and the view of the High Court was that agricultural income arises as soon as the produce is received in kind and not necessarily when sold and converted into money, 1939 I.T.R. 48 (P.C.). The Privy Council suggested that no income arose in this case in Mysore because the green coffee was grown for the purpose of sale, i.e., in British India. The business operations could not be cut into two portions arbitrarily but must be regarded as a whole. On the other hand, with reference to the question whether profits accrued in British India the fact that the coffee was grown in Mysore could not be disregarded, notwithstanding that it was sold in British India, especially if it was sold without further processing of a manufacturing character. The Privy Council however, did not think it necessary to decide whether the income arose within or outside British India, and disposed of the case on other grounds, including the receipt of the income in British India.

Even if 'accrue' or 'arise' in British India be construed to mean to be earned or derived from sources in British India, the problem is one of difficulty when the profits arise from activities partly in and partly outside British India. In this connection see the case of Ramanathan Chetti cited below; 43 Mad. 75; 1 I.T.C. 37.

It has been held that in certain circumstances mere book-keeping might result in the accrual of income in British India even though not received or receivable there. A. T. K. P. L. S. P. Subrahmaniam Chettiar's case, 2 I.T.C. 365; 50 Mad. 765 (reaffirmed in S. V. L. L. case, 3 I.T.C. 421); also Kanwalnén Hamir Singh v. Commissioners of Income-tax U.P., 1938 I.T.R. 675 (All.). These rulings rest largely on the interpretation of section 13, though it is doubtful whether a rule of computation like section 13 can extend the ambit of taxability under section 4 (or 42).

The place where the sale is effected and the price realised is certainly the principal place, but is not necessarily the only place of the accrual of profits. Cases decided under section 42 (1) (as it stood before 1939) cannot be extended by analogy. Section 42 (1) created a special legal fiction in the circumstances specified therein. Not only is there no provision identifying the place of the accrual of income with the place where the goods are purchased but on the contrary section 42 (3) (as it stood then) indicated—either by a legal fiction or otherwise—that it is the place of sale and not the place of purchase which is the place of accrual of the profits. English cases furnish no guidance because of the difference in the scheme of the Acts. Commissioners of Taxation v. Kirk, (1900) A.C. 588 can be distinguished because in that case the business was admittedly carried on in New South Wales, whereas the mere purchase of goods for sale abroad does not amount to the exercise of a trade in the country of purchase, Sully v. Attorney-General, 2 Tax Cases 149. If the assessee did not himself purchase the goods in British India but asked his agent abroad to order the goods from British India, no part of the profits could be assigned to any process performed in British India. The same result would follow if the person exported his own goods, e.g., raw produce of his land for sale abroad, i.e., without purchasing them in British India. Also, if the mere purchase of goods in British India makes it the place of accrual of a part of the profits, the same result could be attributed to the passage of goods through British India in transit. It was held, therefore, that in the case of a resident who purchases goods in British India and exports them for sale abroad no part of the profits accrues or arises in British India, Bhagat Jivandas and others v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 4 I.T.C. 40.

While mere buying in British India cannot result in profits accruing in British India it is possible that a buying office or organisation or agencies in British India might be a "source" of income in British India with reference to section 42, and a part of the income be deemed to accrue in British India, an apportionment being made under section 42 (3).

Where, however, an assessee bought sheep and goats in British India and sold them in Ceylon, and the Commissioners ought to assess tax on: (1) the notional profit arising out of the supervision of the assessee in British India; and (2) an element of profit in f.o.b. prices, such profit not having been included in the Colombo books, the High Court held that in a simple case of purchase in India and abroad the profit can only arise at the point of sale, and that the profit can only be the difference between the cost of purchase and the sale proceeds, Sudalaimani Nadar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 619.

The arrangement in British India of sales and the receipt of money in British India constitute trading in British India even though acceptance of the contract may be outside British India. Tehri Case; Commissioner of Income-tax v. Tehri Gharwal State, A.I.R. 1934 P.C. 34; 66 M.L.J. 127; 1934 I.T.R. 1; 60 I.A. 1.

The Pondicherry Railway Co. constructed a railway line in French territory under an agreement with the French Government. The South Indian Railway Company worked the Pondicherry Railway as though it were an integral part of its own undertaking. The gross receipts of the whole system including the lines in French territory were paid into a Government Treasury within British India. The working expenses were allocated between the two systems in the same proportion as the gross earnings, the latter being shared on a certain arbitrary mileage basis. The net profits were paid in rupees to the Pondicherry Company every half-year subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State for India; and the Agent of the Pondicherry Company in India, who was the same person as the Agent of the South Indian Railway Co., and had offices in the same building, remitted the money to London by Bank drafts. In view of the fact that the profits, though earned in French territory, were receivable in and actually paid in British India to the Pondicherry Company, it was held (Coutts-Trotter, C.J., dissenting) that the profits were liable to British Indian Income-tax and taxable through their Agent in British India, 3 I.T.C. 485. The company appealed and the Privy Council rejected the contention that the Agent was a mere animated "Post office" and that the profits were really received only in London. In the first place the agreement required the South Indian Railway Company to pay the Pondicherry Company "in India in rupees"; and in the second place, if the Agent of the Pondicherry Company did not receive the profits in India on behalf of the Pondicherry Company he could not make over the sums due to the French Colonial Government. Following the South Bihar Railway case, 12 Tax Cases 657, the Privy Council also held that the profits of the Pondicherry Company arose from business but left open the question where the business was carried on, Pondicherry Company, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, A.I.R. 1931 (P.C.) 164; 5 I.T.C. 363; 58 I.A. 239; 54 Mad. 691.

The question whether the 'guaranteed' interest, payable outside British India to a Railway Company if it does not make enough profits in British India, arises in British India has not been decided; but if the guarantee is met out of the profits, such guaranteed interest is part of the profits and therefore arises in British India. M. S. M. Railway v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 280.

An assessee was the proprietor of a money-lending business carried on on his behalf in various places in Indo-China. The business was carried on by agents appointed for fixed periods, who used their own discretion in lending money to customers. The only part taken by the proprietor was to acquaint himself with the general trend of the business and occasionally to issue general instructions. The profits were not brought into India. Held, that the profits were not liable as they did not accrue or arise in India.

Per A. Rahim, Offg. C.J.—"The tax is leviable with reference to the place where the income accrues or arises or is received, and not with reference to the residence of the person who is entitled to the income. This seems to be the entire scheme of the Act. Whatever meaning be attached to the words 'accrue' or 'arise', or such as, 'grows' or 'becomes due or payable', it is impossible to hold that the income in this case could be said to have accrued or arisen in British India. If loans are made and the borrowers reside outside British India and if accounts are adjusted, the moneys lent are realised with profit or are capable of being realised and the profits are periodically ascertained and dealt with outside British India, it is impossible to hold that the income of such business accrued or arose in British India. . . . A number of English decisions were discussed before us, but it is unnecessary to deal with them in any detail, because the English Statute under consideration in those cases differs in many material respects from the Indian Act. In the English Statute the place of residence of a person is a basis of assessment but is not so as pointed out above in Act VII of 1918." Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Ramanathan Chettiar, 43 Mad. 75; 53 I.C. 976; 1 I.T.C. 37.

If the degree of control from headquarters had been greater, perhaps the Court might have been prepared to hold that the profits accrued or arose in British India irrespective of the "residence" of the assessee. See Ogilvie v. Kitton, 5 Tax Cases 338 and Egyptian Hotels v. Mitchell, 6 Tax Cases 542; (1915) A.C. 1022

A company with head office and control in British India had a press in an Indian State. The press levied a charge on persons bringing material to be pressed, and this was received wholly at the factory. The only receipt of money in British India was the remittance to the head office for expenditure. The dividends of the company were payable only at the factory. Held, that the income of the company did not arise, accrue nor was received in British India, nor could be deemed to accrue, arise or be received in British India within the meaning of section 3 (1) of the Income-tax Act, 1918 [corresponding to section 4 (2) of the present Act as it stood before 1939].

Per C. J.—"Even the small amounts received at the head office are not taxable." (Obiter)

Per Coutts-Trotter, J.—"The same sum of money cannot be received qua income twice over, once outside British India and once inside it." Board of Revenue v. Ripon Press and Sugar Mills, 1 I.T.C. 202; 46 Mad. 706; A.I.R. 1923 Mad. 574.

The profits of a company which are derived from manufacture carried on beyond British India cannot be said to 'accrue' or 'arise' in British India merely on account of the head office being in British India. In re The Aurangabad Mills, 1 I.T.C. 119; 45 Bom. 1286.

If the local office of a foreign concern sends to its head office, not offers but orders for execution, business is carried on in British India even though payment may be made only to the head office. If moreover, stocks be kept locally and non-resident principals visit British India at intervals to supervise the branches the conclusion is even clearer that business is carried on in British India, Sri Hardeo Bengal Salt Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 1942 I.T.R. 13.

The pre-1939 rulings, taken as a whole, went more by the criterion of origin than by that of receivability, and even in applying the former criterion, concentrated on the essential links in the chain of profit earning operations and attached little importance to the place of control. Many of the decisions, however have become obsolete in view of the radical change made in 1939 in section 4 and of the insertion of sections 4-A and 4-B; but the place of accrual is still a matter of importance in the case of non-residents and to some extent also of residents who are not ordinarily resident. But even so, section 42 is so wide that cases not falling under section 4 can be caught under section 42.

Interest on Sterling Government Securities.—The former official view was that such interest being payable outside British India did not accrue therein and was therefore not taxable. The question is not of much importance now because not only have such securities practically disappeared but in respect of non-Government loans, the amendment of section 42, deeming such interest to be income accruing in British India and also the prohibition in sections 8, 9, 10 and 12 against the deduction of interest payable outside British India, have radically changed the position, and all such interest is directly or indirectly made liable to tax.

It is a different matter, however, what is or is not chargeable under the Act; and the decisions in the appeals before the Privy Council in the Wallace and Raleigh Investments Cases as to the extra-territorial powers of the Indian Legislature may have some repercussions on the point.

Accrue—Arise—Difference between.—Under the Indian law as it stands since 1918 it is immaterial whether or not there is any difference between the words 'accrue' and 'arise' but attempts have been made to distinguish them.

"The word 'accrues' seems to be the more appropriate word to be used in connection with a periodically recurring right to receive an income which is usually defined in amount while 'arises' seems to be used more appropriately and frequently in connection with a business in which rights arise to receive income of a more fluctuating kind and at more uncertain intervals," per Sadasiva Iyer, J., in Board of Revenue v. Arunachalam, 14 Mad. 65; 1 I.T.C. 75. "Strictly speaking 'accrues' should not be taken as synonymous with 'arise' but in the distinct sense of growing up by way of addition or increase or as an accession or advantage; while the word 'arises' means comes into existence or notice, or presents itself. The former connotes the idea of a growth or accumulation and the latter of the growth or accumulation with a tangible shape so as to be receivable. It is difficult to say that this distinction has been throughout maintained in the Act and perhaps the two words seem to denote the same idea or ideas very similar and the difference only lies in this that one is more appropriate than the other when applied to particular cases," per M. N. Mukerjee, J., in Rogers Pyatt Shellac Co. v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 363.

United Kingdom Law.—The relevant parts of Schedule D, are as below. The other Schedules (for which see notes under section 6) excepting, to some extent, Schedule E, (which relates to public offices, and annuities, etc., payable by the Crown or out of the public revenues), refer to sources of income in the United Kingdom.

1. Tax . . . shall be charged in respect of—

(a) The annual profits or gains arising or accruing,

(i) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; and

(ii) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation, whether the same be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; and

(iii) to any person, whether a British subject or not, although not resident in the United Kingdom . . . from any property whatever in the United Kingdom or from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom; and

(b) * * * *

2. Tax under this schedule shall be charged under the following cases respectively, that is to say—

Case I.—Tax in respect of any trade not contained in any other schedule:

Case II.—Tax in respect of any profession, employment, or vocation not contained in any other schedule:

* * * *

Case IV.—Tax in respect of income arising from securities out of the United Kingdom except such income as is charged under Schedule C;

Case V.—Tax in respect of income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom. . . .

RULES.

Case I.—The tax shall extend to every trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. . . .

Case II.—The tax shall extend to every employment by retainer in any character whatever . . . and to all profits and earnings of whatever value arising from employments. . . .

* * * *

Case IV.—1. The tax . . . shall be computed on the full amount . . . arising in the year of assessment, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not.

2. The foregoing rule shall not apply—

(a) to any person who satisfies the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that he is not domiciled in the United Kingdom, or that, being a British subject, he is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

Case V.—1. The tax in respect of income from stocks, shares or rents, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom, etc. . . .

2. The tax in respect of income from possessions other than stocks, shares or rents shall be computed on the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom from remittances payable in the United Kingdom, or from property imported, or from money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of such remittances, property, money or value brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom, etc. . . .

The English law, as will be seen, gives rise to various problems. First of all, is a person, whether an individual or a corporate body, a resident? If so, a minor question which, however, is a major question under the new section in the Indian Act, is he ordinarily resident? Next, how are we to distinguish between the following classes of trade: trade wholly carried on in the United Kingdom, trade carried on partly in the United Kingdom and partly outside, and trade carried on wholly outside in circumstances making it a foreign "possession"? Then, in what circumstances can 'trade' be said to be 'carried on' or 'exercised' in the United Kingdom? What are 'securities' as distinguished from shares, etc., and so forth.

There is no definition either of 'residence' or of 'ordinary residence' in the United Kingdom Income-tax Acts and the difficulty has generally been in respect of incorporated persons, that is, companies; and the Courts have held [the De Beers Group of cases, 5 Tax Cases 198; (1906) A.C. 455], that a company resides where its head and seat and directing power reside and that it can so reside in more places than one. 'Ordinary residence' has been considered to be a question of fact.

As regards trade carried on partly in and partly out of the United Kingdom, it is a matter of importance whether the business can be separated into two, so that the income from the trade outside can be taxed only on the part brought into the United Kingdom. There is a large group of cases dealing with this problem—The London Bank of Mexico, 3 Tax Cases 143; (1891) 2 Q.B. 378, and other cases of the same type, infra. This particular problem has been and still is of little importance under the Indian Law except in respect of Excess Profits Tax and to a lesser extent and indirectly, in the application of section 14 (2) (c) in respect of income accruing in Indian States.

When a trade is exercised in the United Kingdom, the question has been of importance in catching foreigners trading in the United Kingdom. This is a difficult question with a large number of rulings dealing with it—Sulley v. Attorney-General, 2 Tax Cases 149, and other cases in that group, infra.

None of these cases has any direct bearing on the Indian Law but some of them help in throwing a little, though remote and indirect, light on certain aspects of some of the problems that arise under the Indian Law. *

Colonial cases.—Under the New South Wales Income-tax Act, 1895 under which income "(1) arising or accruing to any person wheresoever residing, from any profession, trade, etc., carried on in New South Wales" or . . . "(3) derived from lands of the Crown held under lease" or "(4) arising or accruing to any person wherever residing, from any kind of property. . . or from any other source whatever in New South Wales", was taxable, it was held in the case of a mining company that won and refined the ore in New South Wales but sold the product in England, that the profits accrued from business in the New South Wales.

"The word 'trade' no doubt primarily means traffic by way of sale or exchange or commercial dealing, but may have a larger meaning so as to include manufactures. But if you confine 'trade' to its literal meaning, one may ask why is not this income derived ('mediately or immediately') from lands of the Crown held on lease under section 15, sub-section (3) or from some other source in New South Wales under sub-section (4). Their Lordships attach no special meaning to the word 'derived', which they treat as synonymous with arising or accruing. It appears to their Lordships that there are four processes in the earning or production of this income—(1) the extraction of the ore from the soil; (2) the conversion of the crude ore into a merchantable product, which is a manufacturing process; (3) the sale of the merchantable product; (4) the receipt of the moneys arising from the sale. All these processes are necessary stages which terminate in money, and the income is the money resulting less the expenses attendant on all the stages. The first process seems to their Lordships clearly within sub-section (3), and the second or manufacturing process, if not within the meaning of 'trade' in sub-section (1), is certainly included in the words 'any other source whatever' in sub-section (4).

"So far as it relates to these two processes, therefore, their Lordships think that the income was earned and arising and accruing in New South Wales. . . .

"The fallacy of the judgment of the Supreme Court in this and in Tindal's Case, 18 N.S.W.L.R. 378, is in leaving out of sight the initial stages, and fastening their attention exclusively on the final stage in the production of the income. The learned Judges refer to some English decisions on the Income-tax Acts of this country (United Kingdom), which in language, and to some extent in aim, differ from the Acts now before their Lordships. The language used in the English judgments must of course be understood with reference to the cases then under consideration." Commissioners of Taxation v. Kirk, (1900) A. C. 588.

A company carried on business in London as commission agents for provisions. It had a salaried employee in New Zealand who had no other business. Every year another servant of the company also went to New Zealand to arrange for the business. The business was as below. The produce was consigned to the London company directly by the consignors, who were local dairies. Against these consignments, the dairies were granted advances through credits in New Zealand banks, opened by the London company. The London company, however, acted only as commission agents, the unsold surplus being returned to the dairies in New Zealand and the sale proceeds less commission and expenses being made over to them. Held, that the profits of the company were actually made in London and that the earlier transactions in New Zealand were insufficient to make the profits taxable as profits derived from business carried on in New Zealand. The relevant expression in the New Zealand Act was 'derived from business carried on in New Zealand'.

"One rule is easily deducible from the decided cases. The trade or business in question in such cases ordinarily consists in making certain classes of contracts and in carrying those contracts into operation with a view to profit; and the rule seems to be that where such contracts, forming as they do the essence of the business or trade, are habitually made, there a trade or business is carried on within the meaning of the Income-tax Acts, so as to render the profits liable to income-tax. . . . But the decisions do not seem to furnish authority for going further back, for the purpose of taxation, than the business from which profits are directly derived, and the contracts which form the essence of that business," Lowell and Christmas v. Commissioner of Taxes, (1908) A.C. 46, 52, a New Zealand case, following; Sulley v. Attorney-General, (1865) 2 Tax Cases 149; 5 H. and N. 711 and Grainger v. Gough, 3 Tax Cases 426; (1896) A.C. 325 (H.L.) and distinguishing; Erichsen v. Last, 4 Tax Cases 422; 8 Q.B.D. 414.

A company with its head office in London owned submarine cables and did business—international telegraphy—in New Zealand, Australia and elsewhere. In New Zealand the telegraph lines belong to the Government who alone can use the lines. The Government received messages from the public together with the entire charge (5s. 2d. a word) and sent the message on to the nearest station of the company, after deducting a penny a word, being the Government's share of the message fee. It was claimed by the New Zealand Government that the profits in respect of the telegrams were taxable even though the profits did not relate to the company's cables in New Zealand (the profits in question related to the lines from Port Darwin in Australia to Madras) nor were received by the company in New Zealand. Held, that the profits from the telegrams from Port Darwin to Madras were not taxable as there was no contractual obligation on the part of the New Zealand Government to receive messages on behalf of the company and send them to their ultimate destination. The profits therefore were not received by the company in New Zealand, either by themselves or by agents, nor were the cables from which the profits in question were derived within New Zealand. There was no dispute as to the liability of the profits from the company's lines between New Zealand and the adjacent colonies, Commissioners of Taxes v. Eastern Extension, etc., Telegraph Company, (1906) A.C. 526.

An association was formed under arrangements between the British and Australasian Governments to realise the value of surplus wool bought during the Great War. The trading operations of the association were entirely outside Victoria (the State which sought to levy tax) and the profits were held not to accrue or arise in Victoria, Commissioner of Taxes v. British Australasian Wool Realisation Association, 9 A.T.C. 449 (P.C.).

Cases in the United Kingdom.—An American firm which had its principal business in New York had a branch in England where one of the partners purchased finished goods for exportation to America where the goods were sold. Held, that the firm did not exercise a trade in the United Kingdom.

"Wherever a merchant is established in the course of his operations his dealings must extend over various places; he buys in one place and sells in another. But he has one principal place in which he may be said to trade, viz., where his profits come home to him. That is where he exercises his trade. It would be very inconvenient if this were otherwise. If a man were liable to income-tax in every country in which his agents are established, it would lead to great injustice," per Cockburn, C.J.—Sulley v. Attorney-General, 2 Tax Cases 149.

A Danish Company had marine cables communicating with the Government telegraph lines in the United Kingdom. The company had work-rooms in the United Kingdom. Telegraph messages from the United Kingdom were sent over the Government lines and thence through the company's cables to other countries. The United Kingdom Post Office under an agreement collected the message fees and paid the company the fees after retaining what was due to the Post Office. The company made no profits from the land lines in the United Kingdom. Held, that the company exercised a trade in the United Kingdom.

"Whatever the word 'exercised' may mean, it certainly includes carrying on . . . and therefore carrying on trade is within that word. . . . I think a carrier who simply regularly undertakes the carriage of goods abroad for money paid in this country as part of his ordinary business, would be carrying on trade in this country although the whole of the carriage was done abroad."—Per Jessel, M.R.

"I think it would in the first place be nearly impossible, and in the second place wholly unwise, to attempt to give an exhaustive definition of what is a trade exercised in this country. The only thing that we have to decide is whether, upon the facts of this case, this company carry on a profit-earning trade in this country. I should say that whenever profitable contracts are habitually made in England, by or for foreigners, with persons in England, because they are in England to do something for or supply something to those persons, such persons are exercising a profitable trade in England even though everything to be done by them in order to fulfil the contracts is done abroad."—Per Brett, L.J., (quoted with approval by Lord Herschell in Grainger v. Gough, 3 Tax Cases 462).

" . . . Whenever a foreigner, either by himself or through a representative in this country, habitually, does and contracts to do a thing capable of producing profit and for the purpose of producing profit he carries on a trade or business." Per Cotton, L.J. (quoted with approval by Lord Watson in Grainger v. Gough, 3 Tax Cases 462.) Erichsen v. Last, (1881) 4 Tax Cases 422; 8 Q.B.D. 414.

A firm of wine merchants resided and carried on business in France. The senior partner visited England every year for about 4 months, when he saw customers and took orders from English merchants. A London firm acted as agents for the French firm. A room was provided in the office of the London firm for the use of the French firm's senior partner, for which the latter paid rent. The French firm's name was painted on the premises and the firm had its own clerk. The wine ordered and sold was shipped from France, and the bills of lading and invoices were sent therefrom sometimes to the English agents and sometimes direct to the purchasers. The English agents collected the monies and did such business as was not done by the senior partner during his annual visit. The English firm received a commission and not salary. The commission not only covered the expenses of the agents but a guarantee for debts. Held, that the French firm exercised a trade in the United Kingdom, Tischler v. Apthorpe, 2 Tax Cases 89.

A company incorporated in Norway had, its registered office there, in which the share list and books were kept and the shareholders' meetings held. There were two Managers, both in Norway. The company owned a ship, the chartering of which was arranged by a Glasgow firm who received all voyage receipts and made all disbursements, retaining all funds till required for payment of expenses or dividends. Held, that the company were not resident in the United Kingdom but they exercised a trade in the United Kingdom for the profits of which the Glasgow firm as their agents were assessable to Income-tax, Wingate v. Webber, 3 Tax Cases 569; 34 Sc.L.R. 699.

A French wine firm had a sole agent in the United Kingdom, who received all out-of-pocket expenses plus a commission on sales. The agent had no other business and his business premises were in his own name. He employed travellers as well as sub-agents for canvassing orders. The orders when obtained were collected by the agent and sent to the French firm, the latter complying with the orders either direct to the purchaser if the quantity was large or through the agent who had a small stock in England belonging to the firm. The wines were invoiced in the French firm's name as vendors. The goods were supplied from France at the purchaser's risk. The French firm had a banking account in London. All gains and losses went to the firm and did not affect the agent who simply canvassed orders and collected the money. Bills and drafts were payable to the order of the French firm; and the agent always sent the bills to them for endorsement. Held, that a trade was exercised in the United Kingdom, Pommery and Greno v. Apthorpe, 2 Tax Cases 182.

A London firm were sole agents to a French wine firm. The prices were settled by the latter. The London firm received an inclusive commission on all sales in England (whether through the agents or not) out of which they met their out-of-pocket expenses. The English premises were in the London firm's name. The French firm's name was published in the London Directory with the English agent's address. No wine was stocked in England. The wine was advertised by the agents, price-lists and circulars being issued by them under the authority of the principals. The orders were collected and sent to France whence the wine was consigned direct to the purchasers in the French firm's name as vendors. Payments were made either in France or through the agents in London. The French firm had no banking account in England. Formal receipts were sent by the French firm to all purchasers. It was conceded by the assessee that the contracts were made in the United Kingdom. Held, that the foreign firm exercised a trade in the United Kingdom.

"Getting the order is the foundation of the trade. . . . The making of the contract is the foundation, substance and essence of trading. . . . To constitute trading in this country by a foreign firm it is not necessary that the payment for goods sold should be made here."—Per Brett, M.R.

"Trade may be carried on in England without an establishment at all."—Per Lopes, L.J.

"In the present case the appellants have an agent or agents residing within the United Kingdom, who, according to my conclusion from the facts, had the receipt of profits and gains, not, it is true, after they have been ascertained as such by the deduction from the gross income of the expenses and outgoings, but as a part of the gross sum which is paid to them. It is obvious that whatever profits and gains there may be from the business exercised within this country, they must be part of the sums which are received by the agents, and I think they are not the less in receipt of profits and gains because they are in receipt of something else as well."—Per Fry, L.J. Werle & Co. v. Colquhoun, 2 Tax Cases 402; 20 Q.B.D. 753.

An English firm acted as agents for a French wine merchant. The English firm canvassed for orders and sent them when obtained to the French merchant who used his discretion in executing them. The wine was sold "delivery ex-warehouse" in France, the purchaser taking all the risk and cost of freight, etc. Payments were made sometimes direct to the French merchant and sometimes through the English firm. The principal's name appeared in the London Directory. Held, that the French merchant did not exercise a trade in the United Kingdom.

Per Lord Herschell.—" . . . In all previous cases, contracts have been habitually made in this country. Indeed, this seems to have been regarded as the principal test whether trade was being carried on in this country. . . . In the case of a trade exercised in this country, I think any agent who received, for the foreigner exercising such trade, moneys which included trade profit, would be within the provisions of section 41. . . . In the first place, I think there is a broad distinction between trading with a country and carrying on a trade within a country. Many merchants and manufacturers export their goods to all parts of the world, yet I do not suppose any one would dream of saying that they exercise or carry on their trade in every country in which their goods find customers. . . ."

Per Lord Watson.—" . . . There is no substantial difference between obtaining orders for wines, according to the method pursued by Louis Roederer, and attracting customers to Rheims by advertising and sending circulars to the trade in England . . . I do not think that the employment of an English agent to collect and remit the debts due by the purchasers can be regarded as an exercise of trade in this country by the foreign merchant . . . there may be transactions, in my opinion, by or on behalf of a foreign merchant in this country so intimately connected with his business abroad that without them it could not be successfully carried on, which are nevertheless insufficient to constitute an exercise of his trade within the meaning of Schedule D."

Per Lord Davey.—"Canvassing for custom is no doubt ancillary to the exercise of trade, and it may be assumed that Mr. Roederer's trade with this country is increased by the employment of agents for the purpose, as it might be by systematic advertisement. But Mr. Roederer's trade is selling his champagne, and he exercises that trade where he makes his sales and the profits come to him. Nor do I think that it makes any difference that it is within the scope of Messrs. Grainger's authority to collect moneys for Mr. Roederer. . . . It is, in my opinion, no more than if Mr. Roederer were, for the convenience of his customers, to open a banking account in London to which they might pay what they owe him," Grainger & Son v. Gough, 3 Tax Cases 462; (1896) A.C. 325.

A foreign firm used to consign goods to an English firm for sale on commission. The latter sold the goods in their own name, collected the monies and assumed all the responsibility for the payments. Full accounts were rendered to the foreign firm both gross receipts and expenses being shown and the commission deducted. Held, that the foreign firm exercised a trade in the United Kingdom, Watson v. Sandie and Hull, 3 Tax Cases 611; (1898) 1 Q.B. 326.

An English firm acted as agents to a New York company. The agents submitted all orders to the principals who rejected orders as they liked, and the agents accepted the orders only after obtaining the principal's authority. Goods were shipped f.o.b. Boston and consigned to the agents at Liverpool who distributed the goods to the customers. Most of the sale proceeds was collected by the agents and subsequently remitted to Boston by drafts. In some cases, customers forwarded their acceptances direct to the principals. Held, that the contracts for, as well as the delivery of the goods were made in the United Kingdom.

Per Wills, J.—"Even if the contract had been made in New York, an executory contract for sale, a man cannot get his money and can make nothing out of it unless he delivers the goods in this country; when he does deliver the goods in this country, he exercises a trade and carries on a business," Thomas Turner v. Rickman, 4 Tax Cases 25.

A Glasgow firm were sole agents in the United Kingdom for a French company with phosphate mines in Algeria. Contracts were entered into by the agents on their own authority subject to minimum prices fixed by the principals. There was no stock in the United Kingdom. The agents appointed sub-agents all over the United Kingdom but subject to the company's approval. Delivery of goods was outside the United Kingdom. The contract required price to be paid 'by cash in London' but in practice crossed cheques were received, sometimes in favour of the agents and sometimes in that of the company. No cheques were cashed by the agents, and all were sent to France. The company had no banking accounts in the United Kingdom. The agents were remunerated by a commission. Held, (1) (Lord Dundas dissenting) that the company did not exercise a trade in the United Kingdom, and (2) that the agents were not in "receipt of any profits" of the principal, Crookston Bros. v. Furtada, 5 Tax Cases 602. But this decision has been overruled in Wilcock v. Pinto & Co., 9 Tax Cases 111, 131, (1925) 1 K.B. 30.

" . . . The decision in Crookston's Case, may probably be supported for the second reason given by the Court, viz, that the profits there in question had not been received by the agents; but on the question first discussed, namely, as to the place where the trade was carried on, I think that the reasoning of Lord Dundas is to be preferred to that of the other members of the Court."—Per Lord Chancellor Cave in MacLaine & Co. v. Eccott, 10 Tax Cases 481; (1926) A.C. 424.

"It humbly appears to me that the judgment of the majority of the learned Lords of the second division (in Crookston's Case) was erroneous. I think that the weight of authority upon the subject in England was much too lightly treated."—Per Lord Shaw, ibid.

A Belgian firm had agents in the United Kingdom for the sale of their yarn. After obtaining the approval of the principals in each case, the agents entered into contracts in the United Kingdom on behalf of the firm. The goods were sent to the agents who distributed them to the purchasers and received payment and gave final receipts. Monthly account sales were sent to Belgium and also quarterly accounts for expenses and commission. The agents received commission on business done but were liable for half the bad debts. Held, that the Belgium firm exercised a trade in the United Kingdom, Macpherson & Co. v. Moore, 6 Tax Cases 107; (1912) Sess. Cas. 1315.

The Industrial Bank of Japan which had no office in the United Kingdom floated loans in the United Kingdom, subscriptions to which were received by three Banks in England. The Yokohama Specie Bank collected these amounts (less commission, etc.) and remitted them to Japan or made them over to the Japanese Government's account in London. The loans were floated with the consent of the Japanese Government whose consent was necessary to the Industrial Bank undertaking business outside Japan. The Yokohama Bank from time to time acted as agents in the United Kingdom for the Industrial Bank but had no general agency power. It was held that the Industrial Bank did not carry on a business in the United Kingdom, Yokohama Specie Bank, Ltd. v. Williams, (1915) 6 Tax Cases 634, per Rowlatt, J.—"A man does not carry on business here because he employs a solicitor to act for him as his agent here." But the judgment was overruled by the Court of Appeal, MacLaine v. Eccott, 10 Tax Cases 481, on the ground that the Tokio Bank exercised, through an agent, the trade of floating loans in the United Kingdom.

The sole selling agents in the United Kingdom of a Dutch company making incandescent mantles, were to sell the mantles at the best possible prices but to keep a day-book of sales open to the inspection of the company at all times. The company sold the goods to the agents at cost price plus 10 per cent. The agents were to get 5 per cent. commission for expenses and del credere, and the profits were to be divided. Neither party bore the loss of the other. The name of the company was not shown on the invoices but appeared on the brass plates of the agents' premises though there was no clear authority for it. Held, (1) that there was evidence on which the Commissioners could find that the Dutch company carried on a trade in the United Kingdom; (2) that the English firm were agents in receipt of profits of the Dutch company, Weiss, Biheller & Brooks, Ltd. v. Farmer, 8 Tax Cases 381 (C. of A.); (1923) 1 K.B. 226.

The ratio decidendi in this case was that though the absence of privity of contract between the foreign principal and the local purchaser, and the property in the goods having passed to the local agent were important features, yet it did not prevent the foreign principal being considered to 'exercise a trade' through the agent. A man may act through an agent even though the acts of the agent do not bind the principal; and it is not unusual for agents to obtain special property in goods secured by advances made to principals.

A Danish firm carried on business at Copenhagen as manufacturers of and dealers in machinery. There were two partners both of Danish nationality and both resident in Denmark. The firm had an office in London in charge of an employee who ascertained the requirements of the customers, inspected the sites of the proposed installations and generally superintended the installation of the machinery when sold. Contracts were arranged for and made directly from Denmark whence the goods were consigned f.o.b. During the war the firm purchased parts of machinery in England and used them for repairs or for new installations; and it was conceded by them that the profit from the re-sale of the goods purchased in England was liable to tax. Held, that (except as regards the goods bought and re-sold in the United Kingdom) the evidence before the Commissioners did not justify the conclusion that the firm exercised a trade in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Income-tax Act.

Per M. R. Sterndale.—"I doubt if it is possible, and in any case I do not think that it is necessary, to lay down an exact definition of what constitutes such an exercise of trade."

Per Atkin, L.J.—"There are indications in the case cited [Grainger v. Gough, (1896) A.C. 325; 3 Tax Cases 462] and other cases that it is sufficient to consider only where it is that the sale contracts are made which result in a profit. It is obviously a very important element in the enquiry. . . . But I am not prepared to hold that this test is decisive. I can imagine cases where the contract of re-sale is made abroad, and yet the manufacture of the goods, some negotiation of the terms, and complete execution of the contract take place here under such circumstances that the trade was in truth exercised here. I think that the question is, where do the operations take place from which the profits in substance arise?" (approved by the H. of L.) Smidth & Co. v. Greenwood, 8 Tax Cases 193; (1922) 1 A.C. 417 (H.L.).

A firm of cotton merchants in Egypt appointed an agent in Manchester for the sale of their cotton. He was not described as their sole agent. As a matter of fact the agent carried on no other business but he was at liberty to do so. From time to time he received from the principal firm authority to sell specified quantities of cotton on terms fixed by the principals on each occasion. He also obtained offers locally which he referred to the principals for acceptance or rejection. In either event the contract was concluded by the agent in England. No stocks were kept by the agent, and the goods were shipped directly by the principals c.i.f. in Alexandria, and the invoices sent by them direct to the purchasers. The bills of lading were sent to the purchasers through the ordinary commercial and banking channels, i.e., in exchange for acceptances of bills drawn by the principals and discounted in Alexandria. The agent at Manchester was in no way concerned with the payment for the goods, nor responsible for bad debts. His remuneration consisted of a commission on sales out of which he met his own expenses. Held, that the Egyptian firm were exercising a trade within the United Kingdom and were properly assessed in respect of the profits of that trade in the name of their Manchester agent who was an authorised person carrying on their regular agency. Wilcock v. Pinto & Company, 9 Tax Cases 111; (1925) 1 K.B. 30.

In a case in which (1) the local agent received offers and communicated them to the foreign principal for acceptance, and the acceptance was communicated to the agent who passed it on to the local customer and made out and delivered "Bought and Sold Notes"; and (2) the agent also received consignment business and sold by auction for commission, the agent meeting bad debts out of his pocket, it was held that (1) the communication of the agent to the customer constituted the acceptance of the contract which was therefore made in the United Kingdom; and (2) that the agent was a regular agent in respect of the consignment business. Rowson v. Stephen, 8 A.T.C. 141; 14 Tax Cases 543.

"It does not follow. . . . that if you find a contract made abroad there is necessarily no trade exercised in England. You may have in the subject-matter of the contract work to be carried out in England by the foreign manufacturer, and the foreign manufacturer may carry out all the work in England and receive payment in England. . . . These questions therefore, viz., where the work is done or goods delivered and where payment is made, are also of importance." See per Scrutton, L.J., in Belfour v. Mace, 13 Tax Cases 539; 7 A.T.C. 6; 133 L.T. 385.

Assesseees were agents in England acting for Danish steamers. Goods for shipment were brought in by consignors direct to the quay, and the agents put them on board. The agents arranged for the berthing of the steamers, loading and unloading them, clearing through Customs, bunkering coal, and collecting freights. The agents were responsible to the Danish shipowners for freight. The agents' clerk signed bills of lading 'for the Master'. The agents were remunerated by commission. Held, that the Danish owners exercised a trade in the United Kingdom through the agents. Neilson, Anderson & Co. v. Collins and Tarn v. Scanlan, 13 Tax Cases 13; (1928) A.C. 34.

An English manufacturer was appointed as agent by a French patent owner to manufacture and sell machinery in certain parts of the British Empire on condition that while the selling price was to be fixed by the English agent, his manufacturing costs together with his overheads and profits were not to exceed a certain fraction of the sale proceeds. The question arose whether the payments made by the English agent to the French patent-owner were taxable and it was held (by Rowlatt, J.) that the source of income of the French patent-owner was the agency in the United Kingdom. The fact that the contract of agency had been made outside the United Kingdom was not considered material, International Combustion Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 532.

Contracts between non-residents.—Per the Master of Rolls: “. . . profits on contracts made here (in the United Kingdom) for the shipment of goods from this country, whether the vendor has sold f.o.b. or c.i.f., by residents here, or by non-residents—if the proceeds are received here by the agent—are taxable. Profits on contracts made here for the shipment of goods from Rotterdam to residents in the United Kingdom are liable. Profits on contracts for shipment of goods from Rotterdam to this country made between non-residents are not within the charge unless the profits thereof are received in this country, Muller, Ltd. v. Lethem, 13 Tax Cases 126; (1928) A.C. 34.

See notes under section 42 as to the difference between the Indian and the United Kingdom law in this respect.

'Exercise a trade' and 'carry on business'—Difference between.—“The words ‘exercise a trade within the United Kingdom’ have no technical meaning and have been said by more than one learned Judge to be synonymous with ‘carry on business.’”—Per Lord Salvesen in Crookston Bros. v. Furtado, 5 Tax Cases 602; (1911) Sess. Cas. 217.

On the other hand, “The question is whether the profits brought into charge are ‘profits arising or accruing’ to the respondents ‘from any trade . . . exercised within the United Kingdom’ within the meaning of Schedule D of the Income-tax Act, 1853. The question is not whether the respondents carry on business in this country. It is whether they exercise a trade in this country so that profits accrue to them from the trade so exercised.”—Per Atkin, L.J., in Smidth & Co v. Greenwood, 8 Tax Cases 193; (1922) 1 A.C. 417.

If it is meant by this that without actually carrying on business in the country it is possible for the non-resident to exercise a trade in the country so that profits accrue to him from the trade so exercised, the difference is similar to that between “business” used in section 10 of the Indian Act and “business connection” in section 42 of the same Act; if, on the other hand it is meant that, even though a person may carry on business (which is a wider term than ‘trade’) in the country, it might be that he is not exercising a trade from which profits accrue to him; section 42 of the Indian Act which refers to 'business connection' brings within the ambit of taxation a wider area of income than the United Kingdom Acts.

Press articles by non-residents.—The mere publication in the press in the United Kingdom of articles written abroad by a non-resident—though written for the British Press and necessitating the visit of the non-resident to the United Kingdom to collect materials for the articles—has been held not to attract British income-tax, Farrand v. Satterthwaite, 8 A.T.C. 85; 14 Tax Cases 469.

Business abroad—Whether separable from business within the country.—As already pointed out, it is a matter of importance under the English law whether the business of a resident, which is carried on outside is separable from that carried on in England. In the case of a bank which had its headquarters in London and branches in Mexico and Lima, and the London office did not receive current banking accounts but merely did the London business of the branches, it was held that 'the bank does not carry on two businesses. . . . They have only one business, which they carry on in England. It is true that part of the profits of that business carried on in England, is earned by means of transactions abroad, but that is not carrying on the business abroad; it is carrying on the business in England by means of some transactions of it which are carried on abroad', per M. R. Esher in London Bank of Mexico v. Apthorpe, 3 Tax Cases 143. In De Beers v. Howe, 5 Tax Cases 198, it was held that the business of the company was one business, 'namely, first to dig for diamonds in Africa, and then to secure the sale of them on the London market'.—Per Mathew, L.J. (affirmed by the House of Lords). In Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490, it was held that the residence in England of a sleeping partner of a firm whose activities were wholly in Australia did not result in the firm carrying on a part of the trade in the United Kingdom merely because the sleeping partner resided in England. In Denver Hotel v. Andrews, 3 Tax Cases 356 it was held that an English company which owned a hotel in the United States and had it run by a manager under the orders of the directors in England, carried on a single business the entire profits of which were taxable in England irrespective of their not having been remitted to England. Somewhat similar cases are Grove v. Elliot and Parkinson, 3 Tax Cases 481; Frank Jones Brewing Company v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cases 6; United States Brewing Company v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cases 17; St. Louis Breweries v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cases 111; Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Company, 4 Tax Cases 41, and in all these cases the tendency was to emphasize the principle that it was wholly a question of fact where a trade was carried on.

On the other hand, in Kodak v. Clark, 4 Tax Cases 549: (1903) 1 K. B. 505, an English company carrying on business in the United Kingdom acquired 98 per cent. of the shares in an American company and thus obtained a predominant position in controlling the American company. The remaining two per cent. of the shares were held by independent persons. The English company had no power—nor had it attempted—to exercise any control except as a dominating shareholder. Held, that the foreign company was not carried on by, nor was it the agent of, the English company. The profits of the American company were therefore not taxable except when brought to the United Kingdom. Again, in Stanley v. Gramophone and Typewriter, 5 Tax Cases 358 in which all the shares of a German company were held by an English company, and the Commissioners found that the English company controlled the German company, it was held that the possession of all the shares, in itself, was not enough for the purpose of holding that the business of the German company was the business of the English company.

The pendulum however swung the other way again in Ogilvie v. Kitton, 5 Tax Cases 338 in which the sole owner of a business in Canada resided in Aberdeen, and the business was carried on by paid managers in Canada who sent weekly reports, and the owner alone was entitled to the profits and liable for losses. It was held in this case that the business was carried on in the United Kingdom.

Per Lord Stormouth Darling.—"It is a matter of power and right, and not of actual exercise of a right or power. Not a single instance has occurred in which he has as a matter of fact attempted to exercise this control or to give directions even about the smallest detail. Yet the right of control is there all the time and it might be exercised any moment. It is a matter, it seems to me, of power and right and not of the actual exercise of the right or power."

This dictum, however, was qualified in Egyptian Hotels v. Mitchell, 6 Tax Cases 542; (1915) A.C. 1022. In that case a company registered and domiciled in England and carrying on the business of hotel proprietors owned hotels in Egypt. The Egyptian business was carried on by a local board which met in Egypt. The local board had all the powers necessary for carrying on the Egyptian business and was wholly independent of any other board. Only general meetings of the company held in Egypt could bind the local board or affect the Egyptian business. The local board retained the profits in Egypt and remitted such sums to England as were necessary to pay dividends and expenses in the United Kingdom. The London board kept the accounts and recommended dividends, which were declared by general meetings of shareholders in England. The directors met only in the United Kingdom and looked after the general control of the company including its general financial affairs. The Commissioners found that the real control of the business was in England, and Horridge, J., took the same view. But the Court of Appeal held the contrary; and opinion being equally divided in the House of Lords, the decision of the Court of Appeal was confirmed. Extracts are given below from the judgments of Lord Parker and Lord Sumner who agreed with the Court of Appeal:—

Per Lord Parker.—" . . . The important point, therefore, was not whether he had power to interfere with the trade or business, but whether he had so, in fact, interfered during the period for which the Crown alleged that he was assessable under Case I. . . The trade or business we have to consider is a trade or business from which profits or gains can arise, and not the trade or business of disposing of and dividing such profits and gains when they have arisen, and I can see no reason why a corporation, any less than an individual, should not be engaged in more than one trade or business at the same time. . . . It may well be possible that the board of directors of the company still retain powers by virtue of which they could, if occasion arises, so interfere with the company's business in Egypt that such business would cease to be carried on wholly outside this country, but, as I have already pointed out, it is not what they have power to do, but what they have actually done, which is of importance for determining the question which now arises for decision."

Per Lord Sumner.—“ . . . The question is whether the profits are wholly or partly earned from a business wholly or partly carried on in the United Kingdom. If he takes a part at home in earning the profits, its importance relatively to that taken by his agents abroad does not matter, nor does the liability to be charged under Case I depend on active interference. Control exercised here over business operations abroad, though they are far greater in volume or magnitude, will suffice for Case I, San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co. v. Carter, (1896) A.C. 31; 3 Tax Cases 407. So, too, will mere oversight regularly exercised, even though actual intervention never becomes necessary, everything abroad going smoothly without it, Ogilvie v. Kitton, (1908) S.C. 1003; 5 Tax Cases 338. Some actual participation in carrying on the trade is necessary, though it may not go beyond passive oversight and tacit control. It is not enough that the proprietor merely has the legal right to intervene; otherwise Colquhoun v. Brooks, 2 Tax Cases 490 would have been otherwise decided, for there the respondent was entitled to intervene at any time, though in fact he never did so, but took his share of the profits just as they happened to be earned by those in control abroad. . . . I am of opinion that what the board of directors actually did, fell short of taking any part in or exercising any control over the carrying on of the business in Egypt, and that where the directors forbore to exercise their powers, the bare possession of those powers was not equivalent to taking part in or controlling the trading. . . . To say that part of a company's business is to pay dividends, if it has earned them, seems to me to be a play upon words.”

An English company owned certain mines in Bolivia. The management was delegated to a Local Board in Bolivia, the object evidently being to get the advantage of the decision of the House of Lords in the Egyptian Hotel's case. An assessment was made on the Local Board in the name of a firm who were the agents in London of the company. Later on, another assessment was made under Case I upon the company itself. Held, by the House of Lords, that (1) the assessment upon the firm was bad; and (2) the assessment on the company was good. It was admitted that the company was resident in England, and it was found as a fact by the Commissioners that the trade was at all events partly carried on in England during the period of assessment. The assessment on the company was therefore good. The assessment on the firm was, however, bad because, in the first place, the Local Board in Bolivia had no separate corporate existence and were merely the agents in Bolivia of the English company; also the agents in England were agents not of the Local Board but of the principal of the Local Board, viz., the appellant company itself. Besides, when the company itself had a residence in England, the Commissioners had no right to tax either the Bolivian Board or the agents of the company, Aramayo Francke Mines, Ltd. v. Eccott, 4 A.T.C. 261; 9 Tax Cases 445; (1925) A.C. 634.

In Noble v. Mitchell, 11 Tax Cases 372 the French business of a company incorporated in England was managed by a Resident-Director in France, who derived his authority from a power of attorney from the Board of Directors in England. He was not bound to attend the Board meetings in England but occasionally did so. He also submitted reports at times to his colleagues. The French profits were not remitted to England but included in the accounts there. Held, that the control was exercised from England. The Egyptian Hotels' case was distinguished on the ground that in it the Egyptian Board derived powers from the Articles of the company while in this case the power was derived from a power of attorney from the English Board.

A manufacturer's representative abroad worked on a commission basis paying his expenses out of his pocket. He had individual agreements with each of his principals (manufacturers) and visited the United Kingdom every year where he resided with his family in his wife's house. The family lived in England throughout. The Commissioners held that the trade or vocation was carried on partly in the United Kingdom and Rowlatt, J., declined to interfere, Spiers v. Mackinnon, 8 A.T.C. 197; 14 Tax Cases 386.

Simple debts.—The locality of a simple contract debt is the place where the debtor is to be found, English, Scottish and Australian Bank v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1932) A.C. 238. Viscount B borrowed some money from Earl K on the security of property in Kenya and interest was payable in Kenya. The agreement was made in England. Viscount B was ordinarily resident in Kenya but sometimes also in the United Kingdom while Earl K resided in Kenya only. Viscount B died and his executors who resided in the United Kingdom paid interest to Earl K in London through a London Bank to be credited to Earl K's account at Nairobi. It was held that interest was taxable as it has paid out of a source in the United Kingdom (by debtors resident there), Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Executors, of Viscount Broome, 19 Tax Cases 667; 14 A.T.C. 320.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary, interest due to a bank on an overdraft at a branch may be paid at the head office, for the debtor can pay the creditor where the latter resides. Therefore, if such interest is in fact paid at the head office, it is 'payable' there. The fact that cheques on a branch can only be paid locally makes no difference, Maude v. Inland Revenue, 19 A.T.C. 29 (K.B.D.).

Agricultural income remitted from Indian States.—The second proviso under sub-section (2) as it stood between 1933 and 1939 gave rise to difference of opinion between the Calcutta and Madras High Courts, In re Mohanpura Tea Co., Ltd., (1937) I.T.R. 118; Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, (1937) I.T.R. 435. The Privy Council overruled the Madras High Court and interpreted the proviso to mean that the widening of the liability of residents under sub-section (2) in respect of income accruing outside British India and later on brought into British India does not attach to the income mentioned in the proviso, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Mathias, (1939) I.T.R. 48 (P.C.).

Material date of residence.—With reference to the old sub-section (2) it was held that the material date of residence for the purpose of the sub-section was the date on which the profits in question accrued or arose without British India; it was not necessary that there should be residence on the date on which the profits were brought into British India, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Karupiah Kangani, 3 I.T.C. 282; A.I.R. 1929 Mad. 351. This decision must now be considered to be obsolete.

Remittances from abroad.—The law as amended in 1939 seeks to tax all foreign profits (not already taxed) that first arose on or after 1st April, 1933, when brought into British India. Before 1939, when a resident was not taxed on the basis of his world income, and even now

(i.e., since 1943), in respect of income arising in Indian States, it is a matter of importance whether a particular transaction constitutes bringing in foreign profits into British India. There has therefore been considerable litigation on the subject.

In Narasammal v. Secretary of State, 1 I.T.C. 10, the Madras High Court held that annuities received through an agent in Mysore and then remitted to the assessee in British India were taxable under the Act of 1886, which contained no specific provision regarding remittances from foreign profits. The ratio decidendi was that "income" means "what comes in"—a definition which will clearly embrace sums derived from a source like this and it is incontestable that in this case these sums were "received in British India". This view, however, was abandoned in later cases: Board of Revenue v. Ripon Mills, 46 M. 706; 1 I.T.C. 202; Sundar Das' Case, 1 I.T.C. 189 and Sir Ali Imam's Case, 1 I.T.C. 402; on the ground that money could not be received twice over by or on behalf of the same person as income.

"The Act (the 1918 Act) contains no definition of the word 'receive' or 'received', but in Murray's Oxford Dictionary the expression 'receive' is defined as 'to take in one's hand or into one's possession (something held out or offered by another) to take delivery of (a thing) from another, either for oneself or for a third party.' In the Imperial Dictionary the same expression is defined as 'to get or obtain; to take, as a thing offered, given, sent, committed, paid, communicated or the like; to accept'. It seems to me that the word 'receive' implies two persons, namely, the person who receives and the person from whom he receives. A person cannot receive a thing from himself. . . .", per Shadilal, C.J., in Sundardas v. Collector of Gujrat, 1 I.T.C. 189; 3 Lah. 345.

The amendment of the law in 1922, so as to cover income received abroad and brought into British India did not help the Crown in Sir Ali Imam's case, 1 I.T.C. 402, since the income in that case was not profits and gains of a business to which alone section 4 (2) as it stood at the time applied. In another case the Amir of Bokhara entrusted the assessee, a trader of that place, and two servants of his own, with valuable furs, for sale in Europe. After selling them and depositing the money in a Bank in England, the assessee returned to India, and found that Bokhara was under the Bolsheviks and the Amir a refugee in Kabul. The assessee settled down in Peshawar permanently. The Amir sued the assessee and the two servants in the Peshawar Civil Court for the sale proceeds of the furs, and by a compromise decree the assessee was given a commission. The assessee claimed that the money had already been received in England and deposited in the Bank there, and that the receipt of commission was a second receipt of the same sum and therefore not taxable. Held, that in the absence of any authority given to him to appropriate a part of the sale proceeds towards his commission he was not the owner but the trustee of the money until the compromise decree, and that the commission was therefore received by him for the first time after the decree and therefore taxable under section 4 (2) as it stood there, Tora Gud Bai v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 8 Lah. 335; A.I.R. 1927 Lah. 512; 102 I.C. 298.

As to receipts in kind forming part of income, see notes under section 13.

In respect of a remittance from abroad, it is for the assessee to prove that the remittance was capital and not income, and in the event of his failure to discharge this onus the presumption would apparently be that so long as the capital in the foreign branch is not depleted, all remittances are of profits. See Schulze v. Benstead, 8 Tax Cases 259; Scottish Provident Institution v. Allan, 4 Tax Cases 591; Murugappa Chetty v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 139; Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Nedungadi Bank, 49 Mad. 910; Chunnilal Nathmul v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 5 I.T.C. 221; S. A. Subbiah Iyer v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 53 Mad. 510; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 449, and In re Multanchand Johurmull, 58 Cal. 999. This however is not a legal presumption but one to be based on facts; and the only legal question would be that of there being evidence, V. P. L. P. L. Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, (1933) I.T.R. 319; In re Hukumchand Champalal, 1942 I.T.R. 109 (Nag.) Balchand Jivandas v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind, 1942 I.T.R. 507. See also Kneen v. Martin (C.A.), 19 Tax Cases 333; (1935) 1 K.B. 499. Relevant evidence would be the accounts of the foreign branches or offices as well as the assessee's British Indian accounts, the flow of remittance transactions in either direction, the state of the capital accounts in the head office and the foreign branches, etc. Thus if the foreign branch remitted, say, a large sum, for the purchase of goods and the Indian office sent back the equivalent worth of goods, or, say, if the foreign branch borrowed money and remitted it to British India and assuming the transactions to be bona fide, the remittance would in either case be one of capital and not of profits. Mere entries in the accounts books, however, showing that the remittances are made out of capital and that the profits remain invested in foreign territory are not, by themselves and necessarily, sufficient to displace the presumption referred to above, Tarachand Pohumal v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1936) I.T.R. 312. On the other hand, positive evidence produced by the assessee cannot be ignored by the Income-tax Officer without any evidence to the contrary and merely on the ground that corroborative evidence to remove doubt had not been produced, Pr. Al. M. Muthukaruppan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1939) I.T.R. 76. It should be noted, however, that all such cases turn largely on their own facts.

It is a reasonable presumption that a man's private expenditure is in the absence of evidence to the contrary met out of income and not out of capital. Where, therefore, the accounts do not show clearly that a remittance is capital but the assessee uses such remittance for his private expenses, the assessee can be put to proving that the remittance is not income but capital. On the other hand, where the accounts and other evidence clearly show the nature of the remittance, its subsequent utilisation after its arrival in British India would not affect the liability to tax, S. A. Subbiah Iyer v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 345; 53 Mad. 510; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 449.

A remittance however may be "constructive", i.e., disguised by a book adjustment or a set-off. The true nature of the transaction must be examined in each case. It has been held that payments made by a foreign branch to a creditor abroad on behalf of the head office in British India did not constitute a remittance of profits into British India, In re Multanchand Johurmull, 58 Cal. 999. A contrary view also has been taken, L. C. T. C. Subramanian Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1935) I.T.R. 346 in which against a deposit in British India by a person who also had an office abroad, the assessee drew a hundi on his own business abroad for the purpose and his business abroad had enough accumulated profits to cover the hundi. Much would depend in such cases on whether or not the debt itself had been transferred to the foreign branch and discharged by it. A remittance from abroad into an Indian State however, is clearly not a remittance into British India. In the case referred to above both the creditor and the debtor resided in British India; and the hundi remitting the foreign income was delivered in British India. Where, however, the hundi is delivered outside British India to a non-resident creditor of a resident assessee who does not bring it into British India, there is no remittance into British India, Commissioner of Income-tax v. K. M. C. T. Murugappa Chettiar, 1940 I.T.R. 297.

The word 'received' does not merely convey the idea of lessening of liability in British India; it refers to receipt in British India of the amount, or by appropriate book entries of an asset which can be pointed out as resulting from the receipt. Therefore, when a foreign branch paid off abroad debts due by the head office to certain creditors, it was held that there was no remittance to British India. In re Sarupchand Hukamchand, 1945 I.T.R. 245 (B. & O.) following In re Multanchand Johurmali, 58 Cal. 999.

Where a resident with a money-lending business abroad received in settlement of an account a promissory note in the first instance and then in settlement of the decree on the note jewels in British India and an assignment of a decree in British India, it was held that even though the decretal amount had not been realised, and in the absence of any evidence that it was not worth its value, there was a remittance to British India to the extent of the value of the jewels and of the assigned decree, A. R. Pl. S. P. Manikkam Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1937) I.T.R. 534; A.I.R. 1938 Mad. 52; (1938) 1 M.L.J. 14 (F.B.).

In a case in which an assessee carrying on money-lending business outside British India purchased land in British India in satisfaction of debts due to his foreign branch, it was held that the constructive remittance involved was one of capital and not of profits except to the extent that interest on the loan (for the last three years according to the law then) was included in the purchase price. S. A. Subbiah Iyer v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 58 M.L.J. 581 and 602. Similarly where the assessee's accounts which were kept bona fide showed continuous remittances to and from British India separately on capital account and on profit account, and the remittances on capital account were utilised to repay loans raised in British India, it was held that the assessee had rebutted the presumption that the remittances were from profits, S. A. Subbiah Iyer v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 345; 53 Mad. 510; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 449.

Where, during the relevant year an assessee's foreign business (in partnership) took over certain lands in payment of interest due on a loan and it was claimed that a part of the remittances to British India should be treated as representing the assets in the lands which were not available for remittance, it was held, following Scottish Provident Institution v. Allan, 4 Tax Cases 591; (1903) A.C. 129 that the withdrawal of monies by the assessee from the firm should be treated as withdrawals of profits and the immovable properties representing profits must be deemed to have been turned into capital assets, M. S. S. Chidambaram Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1938) I.T.R. 713.

If the remittances into British India exceed those in the reverse direction, it is a reasonable presumption that profits have been brought into British India and it is for the assessee to rebut it. The mere non-existence of debit entries in the foreign branch books and of corresponding credit entries in the books in British India is of little evidential value, Jasrup Baijnath v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 5 I.T.C. 90.

On the other hand, the fact that remittances to the foreign branch exceed the sum of the value of the goods and the remittances inward is not necessarily conclusive of no foreign profits having been brought in. If the assessee withheld his books, the Income-tax officer would be justified in assuming that the foreign business made profits and that such profits had been remitted to British India, Sonaram Nihal Chand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 8 I.T.C. 12; A.I.R. 1935 Lah. 727.

That a remittance related to capital and not to profits should be proved by the assessee. Obviously this cannot be proved if the local and foreign books are not produced. It is no argument to say that there was no need to bring profits into British India and that the mere flow of money in the course of business should be assumed to be on capital accounts, Bansilal Abirchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 5 I.T.C. 347.

If the foreign profits exceed the inward remittances, it is a reasonable presumption that the remittances included profits but the presumption can be rebutted, e.g., by proving that all the profits of preceding years had been spent abroad and that the current remittances were in fact from capital. In re Govindram Tansukhlrai, 1944 450 (All.).

Where a resident firm carried on business both in British India and abroad and it brought into British India certain stocks of the commodity in which it dealt at both places, it was held that there was no legal presumption against the firm that the stocks brought in represented foreign profits, notwithstanding the fact that in the firm's headquarters in British India credit had been taken for the foreign profits and the partners been given their shares of such profits. The Commissioner had found as a fact that the inward remittances of money did not represent foreign profits and the case turned entirely on the significance of the stocks brought in and the evidence from the accounts did not bear out the presumption that the stocks represented foreign profits, Spedding, Dinga Singh and Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, (1937) I.T.R. 490; A.I.R. 1937 Lah. 884.

Where a resident exports goods abroad, he does not receive any part of the profits until he has first received the cost of the exports; till then he is recouping only his working capital. The fact that he has made profits abroad will not make the remittance one of profits until the working capital has been recouped, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Bhagwandas Bagla, 1942 I.T.R. 35.

The mere fact that the resident partners went on overdrawing on their accounts with the British Indian branch of the firm when there were no available profits in British India, does not by itself conclusively establish that the firm had received its foreign profits in the year in the cloak of remittances of capital or that the firm had distributed its profits to the partners, S. L. S. Chettiappa Chettiyar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 188; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 119; 122 I.C. 349.

This does not however mean that until there is an allocation of profits among the partners, there can be no receipt of the profits in British India and the receipt by a partnership may be equivalent to receipt on behalf of a partner, M. A. L. A. R. Aryan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1937) I.T.R. 600.

Where an assessee takes over a money-lending business abroad and remits monies to British India, the fact that certain sums represent interest accrued before the business was taken over and are therefore capital must be proved. Mere entries in the books are not conclusive. Similarly the fact that the sums represent capital lent out and returned must be proved by the assessee. If the profits realised abroad are in excess of the amounts brought into British India, the taxing authorities may assume in the absence of evidence to the contrary (which it is for the assessee to adduce) that the remittances are all out of profits, P. L. S. K. R. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 5 I.T.C. 55; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 104.

In a case in which the profits of the foreign branch were added to its capital account every year and a remittance was made to the head office by debit to a "Headquarters current account", the latter not having been operated upon for ten years, it was held that the Commissioner had evidence to hold that the remittance was out of profits, A. V. K. R. M. Kasinathan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1935) I.T.R. 89.

In a case in which there was a continuous running account between the Madras branch of the business and that in Malaya, and there was an entry in the Madras books which had the effect of cancelling the indebtedness of the resident partner to the Madras branch on account of his personal drawings, the Commissioner assumed that there was an appropriation of profits remitted from abroad, and the assessee did not disprove this assumption. The High Court held that the Commissioner had evidence to support his finding, K. V. P. L. Ramanatha Chetti v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 348.

In assessing a person to tax, each year's transactions would have to be taken into account as a whole. If the accounting year of the foreign branch does not coincide with that of the head office, the Income-tax Officer can, if necessary, use his powers under sections 13 and 2 (11) and make the best that he can out of the accounts.

The place of receipt of income is a question of fact, not of intention. The date on which a constructive remittance of profits made by adjusting book entries is made into British India will depend on the date of adjustment in British India rather than on the date of adjustment outside British India, Sir Ali Imam v. The Crown, 1 I.T.C. 402; see also Pondicherry Railways Case, 3 I.T.C. 485 and 5 I.T.C. 363 (P.C.); 58 I.A. 239. An assessee was a partner in a firm abroad. In 1931, the principal partner in it transferred out of profits Rs. 30,000 to one of his own places of business in British India, (where the assessee was not a partner but a debtor), kept the item in suspense for some time and in 1932 adjusted the amount against the assessee's debt due to the British Indian firm. The assessee objected at first but eventually agreed in 1935 to the adjustment. It was held that the profits were remitted only in 1935, i.e., after the consent of the assessee to the adjustment. In 1931 the profits were not brought in as profits of the assessee, A. R. A. N. T. Narayanan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1941 I.T.R. 509.

Where a resident advanced money abroad from his foreign profits towards the purchase of a house in British India, it was held that a constructive remittance took place, not on the date of advance but on the date of execution of sale-deed, Chidambaram Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1936) I.T.R. 309. 'An advance from the general account of the firm before profits are ascertained, cannot be taxed as a payment out of profits, since profits may ultimately not accrue and the partner may have to refund the advance, Ramaswami Pillai v. Ramaswami Pillai, (1939) I.T.R. 40. If remittances are admittedly made out of the profits of the preceding year, and not made in anticipation of profits, the remittances are taxable even though, in the later part of the year, losses may have been made abroad wiping out the earlier profits, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Sm. Ar. Vr. Annamalai Chettiar, 1941 I.T.R. 663. On the other hand, remittances made during a year before foreign profits of that year could ever be ascertained are not income, In re Govindram Jansukhrui, 1944 I.T.R. 450.

Though Chetti firms usually make paper adjustments of interest as between branches with the sole object of adjusting the commission payable to local agents, and not of reflecting actual loans made or interest received, it was held in Somasundaram Chetti v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 61 that, if on evidence the Commissioner found that interest was actually paid by one branch to another, the finding was one of fact in which the High Court could not interfere.

The presumption ordinarily is that a branch office does not make a "loan" to its head office or vice versa. The relation of creditor and debtor cannot exist between a head office and a branch. It follows, therefore, that the remittance of so-called interest on such loans would be treated as remittance of profits. See however Somasundaram Chetti v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 2 I.T.C. 61.

From that fact that a person cannot lend to himself, it follows that, when a partnership business becomes a sole business, what were loans become the proprietor's own money, and consequential book adjustments will not necessarily involve a constructive remittance of funds. R. M. A. T. M. Meyappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1935) I.T.R. 93; 8 I.T.C. 100.

If a resident in British India is a partner in a firm outside British India and makes advances of money to the firm, being genuine loans bearing interest, and takes periodical credit for the interest through his account in the firm as a partner, there can be no doubt that there is a constructive remittance of the interest from outside British India into British India, and the interest therefore would be taxable in the hands of the resident in the year in which he takes credit for the interest.

While it may be a reasonable presumption that where an assessee has two funds abroad at his disposal, one which has borne tax in India and another which has not, he is more likely to remit the former to India, the presumption can be rebutted by the Revenue authorities if the books show that at the time of remittance the already taxed funds were locked up and not available for remittance, M. S. M. M. Meyappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, (1933) I.T.R. 37; 63 M.L.J. 796.

Where, however, a resident assessed had profits abroad and the foreign branch bought with those profits a hundi, in favour of one of the branch agents of the resident in British India, and the latter repaid the value of the hundi (with interest) to the foreign branch, it was successfully claimed that the transaction was a loan from the foreign branch to the particular agent in British India and that the position was the same as if the latter had gone abroad and received the loan and brought it—not as if the assessee had brought it, Commissioner of Income-tax, C. P. v. Mathuradas Mehta, (1939) I.T.R. 160.

An assessee's agent abroad borrowed money there on behalf of the assessee and remitted it to British India. At that time the cash balance of the foreign branch was small but there were accumulated profits which had been lent out. Without any re-transfer of funds from British India, the foreign agent repaid the loan as he realised his outstandings. The loan was repaid within twenty-eight days, and it was held that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the remittances to British India must be presumed to have come out of profits, V. V. R. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 63 M.L.J. 227; A.I.R. 1932 Mad. 573.

The existence of foreign profits together with the fact of remittance into British India, while raising a presumption that profits have been brought in can by no means be conclusive. On the other hand, even remittance from apparently foreign capital sources in the first instance might well be really remittances of income if such income is utilised to discharge foreign loans; otherwise tax can be permanently evaded by borrowing abroad every time to bring profits into British India and then repaying the loans at leisure from the foreign income. Moreover, debits and credits in a bank account cannot be divided from each other, the debits being treated as capital and the credits as income; and similarly the transactions of preceding years cannot be ignored, for what has to be ascertained is the available foreign income. The mere continued existence of an overdraft abroad therefore throughout the year (though reduced) does not necessitate the inference that no foreign income was available for remittance and the entire course of transactions affecting the balance from time to time should be reviewed in order to ascertain the really available profits for remittance, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Nadimuttu Pillai, 1940 I.T.R. 249.

An assessee had profits in a foreign branch K. He opened another foreign branch T, where he immediately borrowed money and brought it over to British India. At a later date, but within the year, he remitted the profits from K to T, and paid off the loan. It was held that the profits of K had been remitted to British India, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Meyyappa Chettiar, 1940 I.T.R. 20.

Foreign profits placed on time deposit in a bank in British India through a foreign bank are not any the less remittance of profits; the case is just like buying Indian Securities with foreign profits and bringing the securities into British India, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Rm. Al. Ct. Annamalai Chettiar, 1945 I.T.R. 171.

What the Act charges is income and nothing but income; if foreign income is spent or otherwise so converted abroad that it ceases to be income, it is not taxable merely because the thing on which it has been spent or into which it has been turned is afterwards brought into British India. On the other hand, in order to attract tax it is not necessary that the income should be brought in in exactly the same form as it was received abroad. The facts have to be examined. Thus, where a cotton mill company in British India bought certain machinery in England with interest on its sterling securities and imported it into British India for its own use (not for sale) it was held that it did not bring any income into British India but only capital goods. There was no evidence that the goods had been bought as a means of bringing in foreign income, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Ahmedabad Advance Cotton Mills, 1940 I.T.R. 95 (P.C.). In In re Bombay Electric Supply and Tramway Co., Ltd., 1940 I.T.R. 432, the Crown conceded that interest on sterling securities payable, and paid in the United Kingdom and spent on machinery, etc., was not taxable even though the machinery was brought into British India.

An assessee, resident in British India, remitted income from abroad to Mysore direct, where he purchased Mysore Government Bonds. There was no finding that the bonds had been bought as a means of bringing in the foreign profits, and the bonds were therefore presumed to have been a permanent investment. After two months, he brought the bonds into British India and used them as cover for an overdraft with a bank. It was held that the use of the bonds as such cover had not altered the capital nature of the bonds, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Muhammad Ismail Rowther, 1940 I.T.R. 150.

If the assessee hands over outside British India his foreign profits to a charity and the latter brings the money into British India though through the assessee, the remittance is not taxable because it is the property of the charity. Whether the profits were in fact handed over (outside British India) to the charity is a question of fact, P. L. S. K. R. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 185.

A resident assessee, a money-lender with a branch abroad, had, in the foreign branch funds belonging to trustees of certain temples in British India and invested with him. His British Indian branches needed funds, and he brought funds from abroad, debiting the account of the trustees in the foreign branch and crediting it in the British Indian one. He utilised the funds for his business and did not pay back the foreign branch. There were enough foreign profits to cover the remittance. The assessee needed the remittance and not the trustees. The trust funds had been mixed up with the assessee's foreign funds and had not been separately invested. It was held that the remittance was that of the assessee and not that of the trustees, A.M.K. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 474. The money brought in should be the money of the assessee. Where an assessee brings into British India money from abroad, at the instance and on behalf of a client of his, he is not bringing in any money of his own, and there is therefore no remittance of his profits, Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. A. K. A. R. Family, 1941 I.T.R. 347. If however, the money is transferred at the instance of and the instructions of the assessee, it could be held—if the other circumstances so indicate—that under the guise of the transfer he brought in his own profits, A. K. A. C. T. V. Firm v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 8 I.T.C. 112.

Partition of Hindu family.—The words “accrued or arisen to him without British India” in section 4 (1) (b) (iii) do not necessarily mean that even in the first instance the profits must have accrued to the assessee; and can cover the case of a member of a Hindu undivided family who, on partition takes over the accumulated profits in a foreign branch, i.e., profits accrued to the family and not to him, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. S. N. A. S. A. Annamalai Chettiar, 1944 I.T.R. 226.

Set-off.—Where the remittance basis applies, e.g., under the second proviso to sub-section (1), it is the actual amount of foreign income brought into British India that is liable to tax. Where there is more than one current business abroad, losses in particular businesses should be set-off against profits elsewhere before foreign profits available for remittance are computed, Narayanan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1938 I.T.R. 705.

Question of fact and law.—While the question of actual receipt of foreign profits in British India is a question of fact, it is a question of law whether on the facts income can be said to have been constructively received in British India, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. New India Assurance Co., Ltd., 1938 I.T.R. 603.

Property abroad and business.—Income from property abroad can be profits of a business for the purpose of the second proviso, if the income accrued as a part of the foreign business, e.g., rents received by a money-lender from property coming into his possession, pending their sale and recoupment of his dues. See A. S. P. L. V. R. Ramaswami Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1933 I.T.R. 389; A.I.R. 1933 Mad. 59; so, also, profits from agriculture if the agriculture constitutes a trade or business. See notes under section 2 (1); and Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Mathias, 1939 I.T.R. 48 in which the Privy Council observed that there is no inherent contradiction between 'agriculture' and 'business'. The profits from growing tea are profits of a business. Accordingly, the entire profits including the profits from agricultural operations from a tea garden outside British India are liable to tax when brought into British India, R. M. S. T. Ponnuswamy Pillai v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 3 I.T.C. 378.

Taking into head office accounts.—The fact that income earned abroad has been taken into account not only in the balance sheet in British India but in determining the dividend to be paid in British India is not enough to constitute a remittance into British India, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. New India Assurance Co., 1938 I.T.R. 603.

See however the cases referred to below: Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Subramanian Chettiar, 50 Mad. 765; S. V. L. L. Lakshman Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 3 I.T.C. 421; also Kanwalnen Hamir Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 1938 I.T.R. 675 (All.), in which income due from abroad and not actually brought into British India but credited in the accounts of the assessee-creditor in British India was taxed. In the first of these cases, the assessee took credit in his British Indian accounts for the interest on a debt due from abroad, though not actually received or brought in, while in the last the assessee had in earlier years included, in his return of income, foreign profits credited to his British India head office, but not actually brought in, and similarly claimed losses abroad on the strength of mere debits to the head office. These decisions are partly grounded on section 13 and the assessee's own methods of book-keeping, it being held that bringing foreign profits physically into British India is not always necessary in order to attract tax. It is doubtful, however, whether by a mere rule of computation (section 13) the nature of income can be changed and the ambit of liability under section 4 is widened.

Income from abroad—Foreign taxes paid thereon.—Though what is to be taxed on the remittance basis is the actual amount of profits brought into British India, it may sometimes be necessary to compute the profits from abroad with reference to the provisions of section 10, in order to determine the allocation of the amount brought into British India between capital and income. For this purpose, foreign taxes actually paid abroad should presumably be deducted from foreign profits irrespective of their deductibility for the purpose of section 10 for levying British India tax or for Double Income-tax relief under section 49, et seq.

Remittance cases in the United Kingdom.—Notwithstanding the general warning against following United Kingdom decisions in interpreting the Indian Act, these decisions offer guidance as to what constitutes a remittance. "The money received by the agents in America remains in their hands and it remains in their hands for investment there. But then an equivalent for the amount of that interest is retained by the managers in this country out of money borrowed by them on debentures for the purpose of being sent out to America and invested upon foreign securities there so that the one sum is just set against the other in the books of the company; and it is for the Court to determine whether that species facti . . . does not sufficiently satisfy the words of the rule . . . that the interest upon the foreign securities has been received in this country. . . . According to the way in which this company keeps its books, it has really converted a sum which was received in this country as capital into an equivalent for the interest upon the foreign securities. . . . They have received it (the interest) in the most proper sense of the term that it enters their books in this country as such interest and is paid away as such", per the Lord President in Scottish Mortgage Company v. McKelvie, 2 Tax Cases 165; 24 Sc.L.R. 87.

A Scottish Life Assurance Society lent out sums of money in Australia on interest. The interest accruing was not remitted to the United Kingdom in forma specifica, but retained abroad and invested or used to cover the expenses of the Australian branch. It was however, entered in the Revenue accounts of the Society as received. Held that interest not received in the United Kingdom was not assessable to income-tax, and that the facts in the case did not amount to "constructive remittance", Scottish Mortgage Company v. McKelvie, 2 Tax Cases 165, distinguished; Forbes v. Scottish Widow's Fund and Life Assurance Society, 3 Tax Cases 443; 33 Sc.L.R. 228.

An English Fire Insurance Company doing business in America received there as part of its profits interest on American securities. The interest was brought to account in the books of the company in England as profits, but it was not remitted to England, being invested in America in American securities in order to build up a reserve as required by the laws of the United States. Held, that the interest formed part of the profit of the company assessable under Case I of Schedule D; and also that the interest was in effect received in England.

Per Wright, J.—"If there is a trade which cannot be carried on without making investments abroad, the interest arising on the investments necessarily made for the purpose of the trade is, it seems to me, part of the gains of the trade. . . . (Also) in effect it seems to me that the £5,000 is received in this country because . . . this money would have to be sent out from here if it were not otherwise provided", Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company v. Magee, 3 Tax Cases 457; 73 L.T. 733.

(The second part of the decision must be taken as overruled by the Gresham Society Case, infra.)

An English Assurance Society with branches in India received there certain interest from securities in India and the colonies. This interest was applied in India towards the payment of the various obligations of the Society arising for settlement in India, inter alia, its obligations under policies, and it was not remitted to England in forma specifica. It was, however, treated in the accounts of the society as if it had been remitted to England. Held, that the interest was constructively remitted to England.

Per Kennedy, J.—"Indian interest . . . was not merely entered in the accounts of the Society, which by itself would be a matter of little consequence, but was retained in India merely as a matter of commercial convenience and but for such retention an equal sum must have been remitted to India to discharge the Society's liabilities there and that in reality the amount of this Indian interest was treated by the Society as part of the divisible property upon which . . . dividends had been declared and paid in the United Kingdom. . . . In these circumstances it appears to me that there is a 'constructive remittance' according to the law as applied in Scottish Mortgage Company v. McKelvie, 2 Tax Cases 165 . . . and in . . . the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company v. Magee, 3 Tax Cases 457. . . . Forbes v. Scottish Widows' Fund, etc., and Forbes v. Scottish Provident Institution, 3 Tax Cases 443, appear to me to be distinguishable. In neither case . . . was the interest received abroad treated . . . as forming part of the divisible profits. It was simply retained and used abroad for purposes of loan and investment", Universal Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, 68 L.J.Q.B. 962; 4 Tax Cases 139.

This case was overruled by the House of Lords in Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, 4 Tax Cases 464; (1902) A.C. 287 (H.L.).

A Life Insurance Company established in the United Kingdom carried on business outside. The business was managed by directors abroad who had power of accepting risks, but all investments abroad had to be sanctioned at the head office. Remittances in forma specifica of interest received abroad were not made, and remittances out of the receipts abroad of interest and premiums were made only as required by the general policy of the company. At a quinquennial valuation, and in the yearly statement of accounts, the whole of the receipts abroad, including the interest on investments abroad were brought into account in the division of the profits of the company. Held, that the interest received abroad and invested or applied abroad was not 'received' in the United Kingdom within the meaning of Case IV of Schedule D, Scottish Mortgage Company of New Mexico v. McKelvie, 2 Tax Cases 165, distinguished (Lord Young dissenting); Standard Life Assurance Company v. Allan, 4 Tax Cases 446; 38 Sc.L.R. 628.

A Life Insurance Company established in England carried on business abroad, and re-invested abroad moneys, including interest, received abroad. The interest received abroad was not remitted to England, but included in the company's yearly statement of accounts and in the triennial valuation, on which the profits of the company were estimated. Held, that interest so received abroad and applied or re-invested abroad was not "received" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of Case IV of Schedule D.

Per Lord Chancellor Halsbury.— . . . Now, here the money has not actually been received in this country. The Legislature must be supposed to have contemplated the possibility of drawing a distinction between money received in this country and money accounted for or credited in account. If it were not for the difficulty of earmarking money I should think no one would have any doubt that the money must be received in this country to bring it within the words of the statute. If it were not money but some commodity, say tobacco, which a trader carrying on business in London and Paris was accounting for to his London house, no one would say that though the Paris tobacco was credited in account as a set-off against some expense or something that the supposed London firm had to set-off against the same claim, and that as the London firm was paid by the Paris tobacco, therefore, the tobacco was liable to the import duty on tobacco because it was taken into account in the books of the London firm.

In no way that I can give any reasonable interpretation to, has the money reached this country or been received in this country. It, like the tobacco in the case suggested, has not been imported, and if the Legislature had intended that bringing it into account was to be equivalent to its being received, it would have been easy to say so.

Per Lord Macnaghten.—As my noble and learned friend Lord Robertson, when Lord President, observed in the case of the Provident Scottish Institution, 3 Tax Cases 443. "Every man and every company having foreign or colonial investments of course knows of the interest arising from them, takes note of it, and enters it in any statement of affairs which may require to be made up." But that, as I think, and as the Lord President thought, is a very different thing from bringing the interest home, a very different thing from the receipt of the money here, in specie or as represented by a remittance payable in this country.

The difficulty seems to have arisen from a misunderstanding or a misapplication of the judgment in the New Mexican case. That was a very special case. Whether the decision was right or wrong it can have no bearing upon the question now before your Lordships. Speaking for myself, I think the decision was right. In that case, as it seems to me, in the transmission to this country of money which the company, was free to distribute and the transmission to America by way of exchange of an equivalent amount which the company was bound to re-invest, the company acted as their own bankers, and did for themselves, by an entry in their books, what might have been done less conveniently and less economically by an ordinary bank or financial agent on their behalf. . . .

Per Lord Shand.— . . . As they left that interest where it was gained, it was never received in this country. Where it was entered in the company's balance-sheet in order to enable the ascertainment of the profits of the year, it was so entered as estate which had not been received in England, but as property belonging to the company which they acquired abroad, which had not been brought home or received here, but which was part of their foreign assets. Money or securities in that position was properly taken into account in the ascertainment of the year's profits, not because it had been received in England, but because although not so received, it was part of assets of value which the company had acquired and held abroad. In the Scottish case of the Investment Company of New Mexico, 2 Tax Cases 165, the species facti was different, for there the company treated the money as received in this country and merely saved themselves the expense of cross remittances. . . .

Per Lord Brampton.— . . . But it was argued that if not actually it was "constructively" so received in the accounts of the Society. I confess I do not like that expression, nor do I quite understand what it means. If a "constructive" receipt is the same thing as an actual receipt, I see no reason for the use of the word "constructive" at all. If it means something differing from or short of an actual receipt, then it seems to me that a constructive receipt is not recognised by the Statute, which, in using the word "received" alone, must be taken to have used it having regard to its ordinary acceptation.

For the Crown, the case of the Scottish Mortgage Company of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (McKevie's case) 2 Tax Cases 165, was much relied upon. I am not satisfied with the correctness of the judgment in that case, but assuming it to be sound, it is distinguishable from the present case. . . .

Per Lord Lindley.—. . . I agree with the Court of Appeal, that a sum of money may be received in more ways than one, e.g., by the transfer of a coin or a negotiable instrument or other document which represents and produces coin, and is treated as such by business men. Even a settlement in account may be equivalent to a receipt of a sum of money, although no money may pass; and I am not myself prepared to say that what amongst businessmen is equivalent to a receipt of a sum of money is not a receipt within the meaning of the Statute which your Lordships have to interpret. But to constitute a receipt of anything there must be a person to receive and a person from whom he receives and something received by the former from the latter, and in this case that something must be a sum of money. A mere entry in an account which does not represent such a transaction does not prove any receipt, whatever else it may be worth. . . . Applying the test already suggested, no one here has received that sum; the agents who received it abroad still have it abroad, or have dealt with it otherwise than by sending it to the company here. No account even is forthcoming to show that the sum has ever been treated as remitted here so as to justify the inference that in any commercial sense the sum has been received in the United Kingdom as distinguished from other countries.

What has been done and all that has been done is that the Gresham Company, in making up its accounts with a view to ascertain what profits it could divide in a particular year entered on its asset aside the sum of £143,483 as money received during the year thinking as I do, that McKevie's case may be properly upheld, I am not prepared to adopt it as a new starting point for further inferences. The language of the Statute is the true starting point on each case. Forbes' case and the Standard Life Assurance Company's case were both based on this sound principle, and were, in my opinion, both clearly rightly decided. The Court of Appeal, in my opinion, considered this case undistinguished from McKevie's but I am unable so to regard it. Assuming them to be undistinguishable, it would, in my opinion, be more correct to overrule McKevie's case than to decide the present appeal in favour of the Crown,—Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop, 4 Tax Cases 464; (1902) A.C. 287 (H.L.).

This is the leading case on the point which overrules some of the previous decisions, and the above extracts from the speeches in the House of Lords will show that while the House was unanimous as to the particular case they were not altogether agreed as to the circumstances in which a 'constructive' remittance might be presumed. That the actual passage of money from hand to hand is not a necessary condition of payment or receipt is not only in accordance with commercial practice but has received recognition in two Privy Council decisions, North Sydney Investment and Tramway Company v. Higgs, (1899) A.C. 263; Larocque v. Beauchmein, (1867) A.C. 358 (a case from Québec). Neither case however was under income-tax law.

The Allahabad High Court considered in Kanwalnen Hamir Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, (1938) I.T.R. 675 that the rulings in the Gresham case could not be followed in India because the corresponding section in the United Kingdom statutes did not contain everything contained in section 4 (1) and (2) of the Indian Act (as it stood before the amendment in 1939).

The judgment, however, does not bring out the relevant difference. In the United Kingdom, when the Gresham's case was decided, the law sought to tax income from foreign investments on a remittance basis, and other foreign income irrespective of receipt; in India, now, the law seeks to tax certain kinds of income on a remittance basis (viz., income in Indian States of residents and in certain circumstances foreign income of persons not ordinarily resident). Before 1939, it sought to tax all foreign income of residents on a remittance basis, and the special provision about deeming such remittances to be income according in British India was intended to get over the ruling that a particular item could not be received by the same person more than once. While the consequences of a particular kind of remittance may be different in the two countries, there is no reason why the criterion of what constitutes receipt (which by the way rests in neither country on statutory definition and simply involves the interpretation of common English words with reference to commercial usage) should differ in the two countries, merely because the consequences of a remittance may differ in the two countries.

Be that as it may, Gresham's case did not lay down any universal proposition that there must be a physical bringing in of money as such to constitute receipt. The words 'brought in' have not been construed in the United Kingdom but these words involve even to a greater extent the concept of physical passage than the words "received in", though even so, it cannot be said that physical transfer is an essential element.

The case of Kanwalnen Hamir Singh referred to above and the Madras precedents which it followed rested on peculiar facts giving rise to the application of section 13 with reference to the assessee's method of accounting. It is still to be considered, however, how far a rule of computation like section 13 can override section 4 which regulates the nature of income liable to tax; or to put it differently a rule which defines when income arises (section 13) cannot be made to regulate where it arises (section 4), especially in the face of an express provision which says that the mere inclusion in accounts maintained in British India will not amount to a bringing in or receipt.

A Life Insurance Society invested funds in Australia. The interest realised was retained and re-invested. In the accounts of the Australian branch capital and interest accounts were mixed together and occasional remittances were made to the head office. Held, by the House of Lords that the remittances were of interest and not of capital and that it was a question of fact whether the remittances were the one or the other.

Per Lord Shand.—"The question is as your Lordship has put it entirely one of fact. The amount of money which was sent out by the the company as capital remains in Australia. It has been gradually increased and not diminished and that amount of money still remains there The moneys that have come home were therefore in the nature of interest and I do not think that the mere circumstance of there being such letters as are here founded upon, as making them out to be capital though they are really interest, can have that effect."

Per Lord Halsbury.—"It is for the company to show, if the fact be so, that the remittance ought to be subject to a certain amount of deduction, because a good deal of it was repayment of capital", Scottish Provident Institution v. Allan, 4 Tax Cases 591; (1903) A.C. 129.

A part of the Revenue of a Life Assurance Society which carried on business in the United Kingdom only, consisted of interest on foreign Bearer Bonds and other foreign Securities. The Securities were kept at the Head Office and the interest included in its revenue account. As the interest fell due, the coupons, etc., were sent from the Head Office to the Society's agents abroad, who received the interest and invested it abroad, as directed by the Head Office, in foreign Bearer Bonds and other foreign Securities, and these in their turn were sent to the United Kingdom. Held, that the interest was not "received" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the 4th Case of Schedule D, and was therefore not liable to assessment to income-tax.

Per the Lord President.—Now, actual receipt of money, it seems to me, can only be effected in one of two ways. Either the money itself must be brought over in specie or the money must be sent in the form which, according to the ordinary usages of commerce, is one of the known forms of remittance As far as the bond itself is concerned, it is, of course, a piece of paper, but it represents a debt. According to the argument of the Crown the money was received in this country the moment the bond came into the company's safe in London or in Edinburgh. Equally it was in America, because the day of payment had not yet come, and therefore it was, so to speak, in the pocket of the debtor. How it can be at one time both in America and in this country is, I think, a difficulty which surpasses even the powers of legal fiction, The Scottish Widows' Fund Life Assurance Society v. Farmer, 5 Tax Cases 502; (1909) Sess. Cases 1372.

A company possessed securities in America. The interest received on them was reinvested in bearer bonds and these bonds were sent to the company's head office in Scotland. Soon after their receipt at the head office the bonds were sold. Held, that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds were taxable.

Per the Lord President.—When a profit or an interest is earned in this country, the question really cannot arise because the profit which is earned in this country is necessarily received in this country. I use the word "received" because you may quite well have a profit which has not been paid to you in hard cash. In many and many a partnership it does not pay its profits in hard cash, or a partner does not take his profits in cash, but nevertheless it is earned, and being earned it is necessarily received by the partner at the time it is earned. But when the profit is earned abroad it is not necessarily received at the same time in this country. It is of course received in the sense of your having a right to it there, but it is not received in this country, and accordingly this fourth case has said that the duty was only to be computed on sums which have been or will be received in the current year. As soon as they are received I think they become chargeable, The Scottish Provident Institution v. Farmer, 6 Tax Cases 34; (1912) Sess. Cases 452.

A debt due by an assessee to a Bank in London was transferred to its Colombo branch and discharged at Colombo by the sale there of certain Indian bonds belonging to the assessee. Held, that there was no constructive remittance of the sale proceeds of the bonds to the United Kingdom, Hall v. Marians, 19 Tax Cases 582 (C.A.). The facts of the case were peculiar. The debt was transferred to Colombo in April; it was a bona fide debt; there had been no intention originally to transfer the debt; the bonds had been in Colombo; they were sold in May; and the debt was adjusted only after the 30th of June, on which date interest in the usual course had been added to the debt. The point is that borrowing money is not the same as receiving income; and in the actual circumstances neither the loans made by the Bank in England from time to time nor the transfer of debt from England to Colombo constituted the receipt of income from abroad.

The mere fact that inward remittances are less than the foreign income is not conclusive as to foreign profits having been remitted; on the other hand the existence of a foreign overdraft at the time of remittance would not by itself convert income into capital because an overdraft could be created for the purpose of the very remittance in dispute. It is possible to have surplus income and also an overdraft simultaneously—whether abroad or at home makes no difference, and what is required is evidence as to the true source of the remittance. In Kueen v. Martin, 19 Tax Cases 333; (1935) 1 K.B. 499, there was evidence that the remittance was from capital. There were two accounts in New York, one an income account and the other a capital account; and the Special Commissioners found that the remittances were neither from income nor from sale proceeds of investments acquired from income. In Fellows Gordon v. Inland Revenue, 19 Tax Cases 683, the remittances came from overdrafts in Ceylon where simultaneously there was income available for remittance.

Where a resident has, at his disposal abroad, both capital and income funds kept in separate accounts with a banker and instructs his banker to send only capital funds from abroad, and the banker, by mistake, debits the remittance to the income account, that debit cannot be taken as conclusive of the fact that the remittance was from income, Duke of Roxburgh's Executors v. Inland Revenue, 20 Tax Cas. 711. If the Bank had discretion as to which account to debit the result may be different.

In Patrick v. Lloyd, 1944 (C.A.) pension paid in India was invested there; and a part of the sale proceeds of the investments was remitted later on to the United Kingdom. It was held that the remittance was of income. Per Lord Greene, M.R.—“.....if a person leaves income abroad and does not bring money to this country for a considerable time, his affairs may be of such a nature that it is very difficult to say whether the money brought in is or is not income money. That may very well be so in some cases. No such question arises here. If it arose, it would be a question of fact.” In spite of much litigation both in the United Kingdom and in India, there is no clear and conclusive decision as to what happens when foreign income is invested abroad and eventually the investments are sold and the money remitted. The result seems to be dependent on the facts of each case as to how far the circumstances of investment change the nature of the money, i.e., as capital because of alienation abroad or otherwise and how far the remittance is merely of the nature of expenditure. If the mere purchase of securities with foreign profits changed their character from income to capital that in itself would have been a sufficient answer to the Crown both in Scottish Provident Institution v. Allan, 4 Tax Cas. 591 and Ibid. v. Farmer, 6 Tax Cas. 34. If that argument was sound there was no need to earmark remittances back from Australia as capital and therefore, as not being taxable. A resident cannot, merely by investing for the time being his foreign income, change its character vis-a-vis the Income-tax Collector; it is quite different when he alienates the money abroad, and the alienee brings it as his income or capital as the case may be.

So, where a resident who had invested his foreign profits in securities abroad sold them and brought in the proceeds through a draft in favour of a hospital which he received and then gave away to the hospital, it was held that there had been a remittance of income. The assessee did not alienate the money abroad but retained control over it until he actually delivered the draft, Walsh v. Randall, 19 A.T.C. 92 (K.B.).

An assessee, with a pension in America paid into his account there, had an account with the same bank in London. He borrowed money from time to time from the bank's office in London on the security of stocks and shares in America. Every quarter the loan was transferred to America and eventually discharged there. Held, following Hall v. Marians that there were no remittances of foreign income to the United Kingdom, Wild v. King Smith, 1944 K.B.D. Macnaghten, J., considered that the mere fact that in Hall v. Marians, the lady had hoped at one time, that her husband would be able to pay off the debt due to the bank in London, while, in this case the assessee had intended all along to transfer the debts to America made no difference.

If a resident has foreign income and gives it away outside British India to another resident who brings it into British India the first resident cannot be taxed on the basis of his having brought the income in. In all such cases, the test is whether the gift was complete outside British India and irrevocable. In Timpson's Executors v. Yerbury, 20 Tax Cas. 155 (C.A.), where money was remitted by the donor's agents abroad to the donees in the United Kingdom by bills of exchange, it was held that the sums remitted were the income of the donor till the bills were actually cashed and that the donor was the person entitled to the income when it reached the United Kingdom. On the other hand, in Carter v. Sharon, 20 Tax Cas. 229 (K.B.), in which the facts were similar a contrary conclusion was reached, because according to the laws of California, a payment became complete when a draft was posted and a draft could not be stopped.

An assessee had received certain income from Trieste which was assessed to tax. He did not furnish the information required by the Commissioners but contended (1) that under the banking system in Trieste all remittance was of capital and not of income; (2) that the remittance was a loan to him from a trust of which he was trustee. The Commissioners found as facts that the account in the Trieste Bank was an omnibus account that stood in the assessee's name as an individual and that he had not attempted to discharge the onus that lay on him of distinguishing which part of the income was capital, the remittances must be presumed to be his income. Held, that as the appellant had not disclosed the necessary information, the evidence before the Commissioners was sufficient to support the conclusions of fact at which they had arrived, Schulze v. Bensted, 8 Tax Cases 259.

(3) Any income, profits or gains falling within the following classes shall not be included in the total income of the person receiving them.

History.—Prior to 1st April, 1939, the corresponding words were “This Act shall not apply to the following classes of income.”

The change of wording makes little change of substance for even under the old words the different classes of income referred to in this subsection could not be taken into account for any purpose under the Act, per Krishnan, J., in Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Arunachalam Chettiar, 1 I.T.C. 75.

Exemptions granted under section 60, on the other hand, may be partial; and even if the incomes are wholly exempted they may be included in the “total income” of the person, i.e., in order to fix the rate at which he is taxable on other income.

Burden of proof.—It is for the assessee to prove that a particular item or the whole of his income falls under one or more of these exemptions, In re Amritsar Produce Exchange, Ltd., 1937 I.T.R. 307 (Lah.).

Payments out of exempt income.—The fact that income is exempt under section 4 (3) does not remove the liability to tax of employees of charities or other recipients of income from these exempted sources, if the employees or recipients are themselves taxable under the Act. In fact, in the 1886 Act, there was an explicit provision to the effect that “An officer or servant is not exempt from taxation by reason only of the income of his employer being exempt therefrom.”

“Receiving them.”—The absence of the words “accrue or arise” or their derivatives and variants is apparently not intentional.

(i) Any income derived from property held under trust or other legal obligation wholly for religious or charitable purposes, and in the case of property so held in part only for such purposes, the income applied, or finally set apart for application, thereto.

* * * * *

(ia) Any income derived from business carried on on behalf of a religious or charitable institution when the income is applied solely to the purposes of the institution and—

(a) the business is carried on in the course of the carrying out of a primary purpose of the institution, or

(b) the work in connection with the business is mainly carried on by beneficiaries of the institution.

(ii) Any income of a religious or charitable institution derived from voluntary contributions and applicable solely to religious or charitable purposes.

* * * * *

In this sub-section "charitable purpose" includes relief of the poor, education, medical relief, and the advancement of any other object of general public utility; but nothing contained in clause (i), clause (ia) or clause (ii) shall operate to exempt from the provisions of this Act that part of the income of a private religious trust which does not enure for the benefit of the public.

CHARITIES.

History.—In the 1886 Act "any income derived from property solely employed for religious or public charitable purposes" was exempt; in 1918, the present form of clauses (i) and (ii) and the main part of the definition of "charitable purpose" were adopted. Clause (ia) and the latter part of the definition excluding private religious trusts were inserted in 1939.

"Property."—In In re Lachhman Das Narain Das, 1 I.T.C. 378; 47 All. 68, it was held that a share of profits of a registered firm belonging to a charitable trust which was a partner in the firm and actually devoted to charitable purposes was not exempt under this clause. The ratio decidendi is by no means clear, but if it rested on the assumption that 'property' could not include a share in a business, this view must be taken as overruled by the Privy Council in the Tribune case, 1939 I.T.R. 415.

"'Property' is the generic term for all that a person has dominion over." "Property is the most comprehensive of all terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have, Jones v. Skinner, S.L.J. Ch. 90" (Stroud).

"It seems to me therefore that the word 'property' in the exemption in question cannot import legal ownership. It imports the right of possession and exclusive enjoyment. Moreover that is the ordinary meaning of the term. The word 'property' is not a technical expression. No one in ordinary language would speak of land or buildings vested in a trustee and in which the trustee has no beneficial interest as his 'property'. . . . I may observe that if your Lordships will turn to the Act of 1854 . . . you will find the very expression 'property of the institution' used in more than one place to denote real and personal property held on trust for the purposes of the institution, though not legally vested in the institution itself", per Lord Macnaghten in Mayor of Manchester v. McAdam, 3 Tax Cases 491; (1896) A.C. 500, 513.

The General Clauses Act (X of 1897) while not defining 'property' defines 'movable property' as all property that is not immovable. 'Property' has been held to apply to debts, in certain circumstances, to choses-in-action of all kinds, to copyrights, to patents, to debentures and even to Government annuities; but even this wide interpretation cannot include the right to a future salary, Eggar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 2 I.T.C. 286; 4 Rang. 538; A.I.R. 1927 Rang. 95. In this case, a professor had agreed, as a condition of his appointment, to hand over his salary for the benefit of students and did so. It was held that the salary was not income from property held under trust. The money became trust money, if at all, only after it was paid over to the trust, and not when received by the professor.

A possible distinction between income from business and that from property is that in the latter case the person to whom income accrues takes no active part in the operations producing profits or, to put it in another way, the distinction is between 'property' and 'personal exertion'; but this line of reasoning is ruled out to some extent by the decisions in Excess Profits Duty cases, of which the leading one is Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. South Bihar Railway, 12 Tax Cases 657, holding that it is possible to have a business without being busy! In Malak v. Commissioner of Income-tax, C.P., 2 I.T.C. 443, the Crown conceded that 'business' was 'property' for the purpose of clause (i). According to the Income-tax Manual, the word 'property' in section 4 (3) (1) "does not bear the restricted meaning that it bears in section 9 of the Act but includes securities or business or a share in a business."

Clause (i) (a) which is based on the English law gives the concession to business profits only under stringent conditions, viz., (1) the business should be carried on in the course of the carrying out of a primary purpose of the institution or the work in connection with the business should be carried on mainly by the beneficiaries, (2) it should be carried on on behalf of a religious or charitable institution, and (3) the profits should be applied solely to the purposes of the institution.

In In re Gadodia stores, 1944 I.T.R. 385 (Lah.) it was held that clause (1) applies to cases of 'trust or other legal obligation' while clause (1-a) applies to cases not covered by a trust or other legal obligation. If clause (1-a) had been intended to be an exception to clause (1), it should have been expressed as a proviso; as the clause stands, it gives an additional concession in cases not covered by clause (1). If both the clauses were intended to refer to the same class of institutions, the same set of words should have been used.

The word 'property' is of wide import as held by the Privy Council in the Currimbhoy Case, 1935 I.T.R. 395, and so taken for granted at all stages (including before the Privy Council) in the Tribune Case, 1939 I.T.R. 415, and covers a business. Moreover the general provision in clause (1-a) (i.e., not confined to trusts) cannot override the special concession in clause (1) (relating to trusts).

In the Tribune Case, the word 'property' was held to cover the stock and goodwill of the press and the newspaper, while in the case of the All-India Spinners Association, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.), it was held to cover the organisation and undertaking and the fluctuating stock of yarn and cloth.

'On behalf of' probably includes also 'by', for there is no reason why business carried on by an institution should be in a more disadvantageous position than a business carried on on its behalf. The various conditions imposed would all be questions of fact.

'Held under trust.'—These words refer to cases in which there is a regular trust. A formal deed, however, is not necessary to constitute a trust, still less a legal obligation binding the trustees. The rules of the constitution will be enough for this purpose, a departure from the rules would be a breach of trust or legal obligation which the Court could restrain All-India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.).

'Other legal obligation.'—This has not been defined, but it would clearly include Moslem Wakfs and Hindu Endowments, In re Trustees of the Tribune, 1939 I.T.R. 415 (P.C.). See also obligations in the nature of trusts contemplated in sections 80 to 95 of the Indian Trusts Act. The test of 'general public utility' applies as much to trusts in the English Sense as to other trusts or other legal obligation. A formal trust is not necessary to secure the exemption, Eggar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 2 I.T.C. 286. All that is required is a legal obligation to apply the income to charitable or religious purposes. But mere entries in the assessee's books will not in themselves constitute a trust or other legal obligation, Rm. Ar. Ar. Rm. Ar. Arunachalam Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 38.

Trust—Existence of—Question of fact.—Though it is not necessary in order to create a trust that the person or persons in whose favour the trust is created or the public should know about it, or that the trustor should divest himself of control, P. L. S. K. R. Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 5 I.T.C. 50, the absence of such knowledge is a circumstance to be taken into account in deciding whether or not there had been a real dedication to a charity and whether or not the fund so created or the trust so said to be created can be revoked. This is purely a question of fact, Rm. Ar. Ar. Rm. Ar. Arunachalam Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 3 I.T.C. 38.

Wholly.—This word means 'solely' and not 'mainly', Commissioner of Income-tax v. Maulana Malak, 105 I.C. 155; A.I.R. 1928 Nag. 10.

Property held in part for such purposes.—In such cases the Income-tax Officer has to satisfy himself as to the actual application or setting apart of the income. It is not necessary that the income should have been so applied before the assessment or in the year of receipt. It will be sufficient if it is "finally set apart for application" to charitable or religious purposes. 'Finally' evidently means irrevocably.

Where, however, the trustee has discretion as to disbursements and some of the purposes are clearly not charitable, the trust is not charitable and cannot get the benefit of this sub-clause, In re Probynabad Stud Farm, (1936) I.T.R. 114 (Lah.).

Where the objects of a fund are distributive and the whole of the funds may be expended on any one of them at the discretion of the trustees, and even one of the objects is not charitable, the trust is not charitable: On the other hand, if there is a general charitable intention, the trust will not fail merely because, within the ambit the trustees are given discretion, and if the trustee selects an object not charitable in law, the Court will intervene and rectify the error, In re Tilak Memorial Fund, 1942 I.T.R. 26 (Bom.).

A trust which, inter alia, among admittedly charitable purposes had for its objects the following, viz.: "the agricultural, industrial, commercial and other pursuits" of a (religious) community, "entertaining guests, giving at-homes and parties"; "contributions to memorials, funds raised for holding social, educational, religious, industrial or political conferences or congresses and for public entertainments which the spiritual head of the community for the time being may deem fit," and in which no part of the property was set apart so as to be identified as appropriated exclusively for charitable or religious purposes, was held by the Privy Council to be ineligible for the concession under this section, Moulana Malak v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Central Provinces, 57 I.A. 260; A.I.R. 1930 P.C. 226; affirming A.I.R. 1928 Nag. 10. Income from property dedicated to a wakf which is employed for the maintenance of an individual and his children, even if ultimately the income might be used for pious or charitable purposes, is similarly ineligible, Umar Baksh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 402; Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, v. Abudakar Abdul Rahman, 1939 I.T.R. 139; Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind v. Ibrahimji Kakeemji, etc., 1940 I.T.R. 500; Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Jamal Muhammad, 1941 I.T.R. 375; Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Karim Brothers Charity, 1943 I.T.R. 603; Commissioner of Income-tax Madras v. Shirazi, 1944 I.T.R. 179.

Consequent on the observation of the Privy Council in the Tribune Case, as to local custom, etc., there has been much litigation in respect of Muslim family charities as will be seen above.

The maintenance of a Shebait may or may not come within the category of religious or charitable purpose. It depends on the circumstances of the case. If, for instance, a dedication is absolute and a small portion of the income is given to the Shebait for the remuneration for carrying out the trusts of the endowment, it would not be secular. If, on the other hand, a fixed sum is given to religious or charitable purposes and the residue of the income is given to the Shebait for his maintenance, the residue would be held to be secular.

The test is whether a suit for partition lies for division of the residue. In any case, any portion of the income dedicated under the trust which may be misappropriated would also be assessable.—(Income-tax Manual).

In any case, after the amendment of 1939, that part of the income of a "private religious trust" (which expression may need judicial interpretation) which does not enure for the benefit of the public is not exempt.

A trust in which the managing trustee, the founder, could borrow without limit, which he could revoke or utilise for his own purpose or for that of his companies is not charitable. The mere possibility that some day the undoubtedly charitable institution contemplated by the trust would come into existence is not sufficient to constitute a charity, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. G. D. Naidu Institute, 1942 I.T.R. 358. On the other hand, where a will ran "My trustee shall utilise my residuary property for such acts of charity as he deems proper, but if my trustee thinks fit, he can give a one-fourth part of my residuary property to X", it was held that three-fourths of the income of the residue was exempt from tax, Chaturbhuj Vallabhdas v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 144.

Only to the extent that a mixed wakf (i.e., partly charitable and partly not) is charitable is its income exempt, Commissioner of Income-tax, Sind v. Ibrahimji Hakimji, etc., 1940 I.T.R. 501.

Where the property is under trust or other legal obligation wholly for religious or charitable purposes, the Income-tax Officer cannot enquire into the actual application of the income. The trustee will take the consequences under the law for any breach of trust, but the Income-tax Officer cannot refuse exemption on the ground that the income is not in fact being applied to the purposes of the trust. Examples of partial trusts are where property is bequeathed subject to the maintenance of certain charities or when a manager of a charity gets a share of the trust income as his remuneration.

Expenses of management.—Where property is held in part only for religious or charitable purposes, a proportionate share of any expenses incurred on management is allowable.—Income-tax Manual).

Religious.—The word has not been defined, nor is a simple definition possible. The English law forbids bequests for 'superstitious purposes' but there is no such prohibition in India. Whether a particular purpose is 'religious' or not would depend on the circumstances of each case, on the personal law of the person concerned, and on custom. It has been held, Umar Baksh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 5 I.T.C. 402; see also Humayam Raza Chaudhury v. Commissioner of Income-tax, B. & O., 10 I.T.C. 7; A.I.R. 1936 Pat. 532 that, since a taxing statute is intended to be of universal application in the absence of clear words to the contrary, the words "religious and charitable" should be construed without reference to the personal law of the assessee; and that further, since the law has been drafted in the English language by persons personally acquainted with English law on the point, it was only proper to construe the words with reference to English law.

Though this decision has not been overruled, not having been considered at all, the Privy Council have made it clear in In re Trustees of the Tribune, (1939) I.T.R. 415 and in All-India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482, that under the Indian Act the test of general public utility should be applied with reference to customary law and common opinion amongst the community to which the parties interested belong. There is nothing wrong, however, in construing words in the Indian Act which is in the English language with reference to the meaning given to such words in the construction of similar statutes in the United Kingdom, even though the actual tests to be applied, e.g., the test of general public utility, may be different in the two countries, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Jamal Muhamad & Co., 1941 I.T.R. 375.

The promotion of religion means the promotion of spiritual teaching in a wide sense and the maintenance of the doctrines on which it rests and the observances that serve to promote and manifest it—not merely a foundation or cause to which such religion or teaching can be merely related. Therefore, a society formed for the purpose of settling Jews in Palestine, which had power to own schools, build factories, railways, etc., and own property for the purpose was held not to be charitable, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Keren Kayemeth Le Jisroel, Ltd., 10 A.T.C. 160; (1931) 2 K.B. 465.

Charitable purposes.—The Act defines 'charitable purpose' as including 'relief of the poor, education, medical relief, and the advancement of any other object of general public utility.' Analogous definitions in other Acts are the following: Section 3 of the Charitable Endowments Act (VI of 1890) defines 'charitable purpose' as including relief of the poor, education, medical relief, and the advancement of any other object of general public utility, but not a purpose which relates exclusively to religious teaching or worship. The latter part of this definition has been omitted from the definition in the Income-tax Act, and 'religious' purposes also get exemption under the Indian Income-tax Act. Section 17 of the Transfer of Property Act refers to 'religious and charitable' endowments as being 'for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, health or any other object beneficial to mankind'.

The question of determining whether a purpose is charitable usually arises in the administration of the law of property; and there is little difficulty in applying the same principles in determining the objects of an institution as in determining the purposes to which property is devoted.

As the word used is 'includes', the definition is not exhaustive. If the endowment is religious, it is not charitable for the purposes of this exemption to the extent that income from a private religious trust does not enure to the benefit of the public; this condition was formally included in the section in 1939. If the endowment is not religious, and at the same time it is meant to benefit a few persons, it can hardly be considered 'charitable.' There is no such thing as a private charitable trust; there may be a private trust for religious purposes and the amendment in 1939 makes it clear that such private trusts are not exempt from tax, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Jamal Muhammad Sahib, 1941 I.T.R. 375.

The words 'general public utility' however, should be construed, in a negative sense as not confined to the advantage of a few specified persons and not as meaning to the benefit of the community generally irrespective of class or creed. It would be quite sufficient if the benefit went to a section of the community. See Re Mellody, (1918) 1 Ch. 228 a case of a bequest providing for an annual treat to some school children. The point in all such cases is that the donor does not intend the benefit to go to particular individuals nor to let them claim the benefit. A trust or gift is not charitable merely because it is beneficial to the public, see In re Headmaster's Conference, 10 Tax Cases 73. A benevolent purpose or a liberal purpose is not necessarily a charitable purpose, per Lawrence, L.J., in Trustees of Robert Marine Mansions v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 11 Tax Cases 425. The guiding principle is given in Re Nottage, (1895) 2 Ch. 649 in which a testator endowed a cup for yacht-racing, and the endowment was not considered charitable.

Per Kekewich, J. (whose judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal).—"In order to uphold this gift as charitable, I think I ought to see that it is by itself directly, and as its necessary and intended result, beneficial to the community. Almost any gift may in some sense be said to be beneficial to the community."

The point is that the avowed object must be the benefit of the community; that is, there can be no charity, without there being a charitable intention. On the other hand, the mere intention of the donor will not be conclusive and it is for the Court to decide what is the nature of the object of the trust, In re Trustees of the Tribune, (1939) I.T.R. 415 (P.C.). A gift "unto my country, England" has been held to be charitable. In re Smith: Public Trustee v. Smith, (1932) 1 Ch. 153.

It has been held in England that disinterested or altruistic work is not necessarily charitable nor is public utility as such, Anglo Swedish Society v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 34; and, though the definition of "charitable purpose" in the Indian Income-tax Act includes an object of public utility, the words "public utility" should presumably be construed in an immediate rather than a remote sense.

It is not necessary that a 'charity' should benefit only the poor to the exclusion of the rich.

"I am quite aware that a trust may be charitable though not confined to the poor, but I doubt very much that a trust would be declared to be charitable which excluded the poor", Per Lindley, L.J., in In re Macduff, (1896) 2 Ch. 451.

"To ascertain whether a gift constitutes a valid charitable trust. . . a first enquiry must be held whether it is public,—whether it is for the benefit of the community or an appreciably important part of the community. The inhabitants of a Parish or town or any particular class of such inhabitants may for instance be the objects of such a gift, but private individuals, or a fluctuating body of private individuals cannot. If this test is satisfied, is it necessary to find further that the class is confined to poor persons to the exclusion of persons not poor? Is poverty a necessary element?" Per Lord Wrenbury in Verge v. Somerville, (1924) A.C. 596, in which he cited with approval the dictum of Lindley, L.J., quoted above and the Privy Council held that a valid charitable trust may exist although its benefit is not confined to the poor to the exclusion of the rich.

Where money is to be—and has been—expended for the purpose of providing or equipping a recreation ground, not for the public at large but for the employees of the donor (though, when not required by the latter, the ground might be handed over to the residents of the locality), there is no charitable purpose. There is a valid distinction between a particular section of the public at large which arises from their residence in a particular locality and a particular section of individuals which is created by the act of selection by a public company. The employees of such a company are altogether in a different position from the freemen or cottagers or the school children of a particular locality. Wernher's Charitable Trust v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 A.T.C. 73 (K.B.D.); (1937) 2 All. E. R. 488. A trust for amenities in a borough, viz., recreation ground is charitable, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Tay Port Town Council, 20 Tax Cas. 191 (C.S.).

A Hospital or School might well be not 'charitable'. Proprietary schools are not unknown in this country. Before an institution can claim to be charitable, it must possess some eleemosynary feature. A hospital conducted on business lines, which takes only paying patients is not a 'charitable' institution even though the profits be applied inter alia to the improvement of the premises, St. Andrews Hospital v. Shearsmith, (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 624; 2 Tax Cases 219; Blake v. Mayor of London, (1887) 18 Q.B.D. 437; 2 Tax Cases 209. Nor, on the other hand, will the fact that some people pay for the benefits make an institution other than charitable, if on the whole it is really 'charitable', nor the fact that the charity does not go far enough, Trustees of Mary Clark Home v. Anderson, (1908) 2 K.B. 645; 5 Tax Cases 48.

The only exception to the general course of rulings in the United Kingdom is In re Gosling, 1900-48 W.R. 300 in which a trust was held to be charitable even though the beneficiaries were employees of a particular bank.

The following are some of the Indian decisions as to what constitutes 'charities'. A University which conferred degrees only and did not teach, professorship, Manorama v. Kalicharan, 31 Cal. 166; the construction or maintenance of a well or cistern for drinking water for men and animals, Karuppa v. Arumuga, 5 Mad. 383; Tricundas v. Khimji, 16 Bom. 626; the construction or maintenance of a choultry, dharamsala or poor-feeding house (Authorities are hardly necessary, as such charities are so common in the country); a School, Hardasi v. Secretary of State, 5 Cal. 528; Mazhar Hussain v. Abdul Hadi, 33 All. 400; the giving of alms including food to the poor, fakirs, ascetics, travellers, etc., Ganapati v. Savitri, 21 Mad. 10; Rajendralal v. Raj Kumari, 34 C. 5; a dispensary or hospital, Hardasi v. Secretary of State, 5 Cal. 528; Mazhar Hussain v. Abdul Hadi, 33 All. 400. Hostels for students attached to a college, has been held to be a charitable purpose within the meaning of the Bombay City Municipal Act, Monie v. Scott, 43 Bom. 281.

On the other hand, while a University is undoubtedly a charitable institution, it is doubtful whether the income of a University not derived from its endowed funds but from its fees, etc., is exempt under this section. To avoid doubt, however, the Governor-General in Council has exempted such fees, etc., by Notification under section 60.

Income from property held in trust for the purpose of running a newspaper of certain political views (a contingent, but not an actual, beneficiary, being a College) was, according to the Lahore High Court, not income received for charitable purposes. In the definition in the statute, the words "education, etc., or any object of public utility" must be considered in conjunction with the word "charitable", that is to say, what is given should be free or at concession rates. Further the purposes must be wholly charitable if the case falls under clause (1), Trustees of the Tribune Press v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1935 Lah. 570. According to the dissenting judgment in this case the definition does not import an eleemosynary basis into two of the items, namely "education" and "any object of public utility". The definition, which is not exhaustive, has qualified some of the items but not the items "education" and "any object of general public utility", and the plain meaning of the words must not be cut down by Courts. The case went on appeal to the Privy Council who reversed the decision. A trust for conducting a newspaper as a mere vehicle for propagating particular political or fiscal views or policy may not be within the exemption (cf. Bonar Law Memorial Trust Case, 17 Tax Cases 508), but where the object of the trust is to disseminate news and ventilate public opinion on matters of public interest, the mere fact that the paper may have acquired, or may acquire, a particular political complexion will not take away the exemption. Also, so long as the trust is not carried on for a private benefit, it is not a necessary condition of 'general public utility' that the trust should provide something for nothing or for less than cost or for less than market price, 1939 I.T.R. 415 (P.C.).

A trust for the benefit of employees (preferably but not necessarily, indigent) of a group of associated commercial concerns was held not to be charitable, both because the benefit was not public and because the trust was not necessarily for the relief of poverty, sickness, etc. In re Mercantile Bank of India (Agencies), 1942 I.T.R. 512 (Cal.); so also a trust for scholarships to deserving members and descendants of a family, Arur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1945 I.T.R. 465. Such a trust is private and not public.

The admissibility of a claim to exemption must be determined by the language of the relevant provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act and not with reference to English statutes. In re Trustees of the Tribune, 1939

I.T.R. 415 (P.C.). The English decisions on the law of charities are not based on definite and precise statutory provisions. They have been developed in the course of more than three centuries by the Chancery courts. The list of charitable objects in the preamble to the Act of 1601 was taken as a sort of chart or scheme by the Courts which adopted it as a ground work for developing the law. In doing so, they made liberal use of analogies, so that the modern English law can only be ascertained by considering a mass of particular decisions, often difficult to reconcile. It is true that the definition in section 4 (3) of the Indian Act has largely been influenced by Lord Macnaghten's definition of 'charity' in the Pemsel case, 1891 A.C. 531; 3 Tax Cas. 53; but that definition has no statutory authority and is not precisely followed in the most material particular, viz., the words of the section include "the advancement of any other object of general public utility", whereas Lord Macnaghten's were "other purposes beneficial to the community". The difference, particularly the use of the word 'public' in the one case, is of importance. This would exclude the object of private gain, such as an undertaking for commercial profit; on the other hand, it cannot exclude a purpose, which may be of public benefit, though there may be difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the object, e.g., helping the poor agriculturist through making him spin yarn or weave cloth. All-India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.). If an instrument uses the word 'charity' generally, without any qualification, it refers to public charity, and is covered by 'charitable purposes' in this sub-section. Chathurbhujdas Vallabhdas v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1946 I.T.R. 144.

Institution.—"The essential idea conveyed by it, in connection with such adjectives as 'Scientific or literary', is often no more than a system, scheme or arrangement by which literature or science is promoted, without reference to the persons with whom the management may rest, or in whom the property appropriated for these purposes may be vested save in so far as these may be regarded as a part of such system, scheme or arrangement. That is certainly a well-recognised meaning of the word. One of the definitions contained in the Imperial Dictionary is as follows: "A system plan or society, established by law or by the authority of individuals for promoting any object, public or social", per Lord Herschell in Mayor, etc., of Manchester v. McAdam, 3 Tax Cases 491; (1896) A.C. 500.

"It is a little difficult to define the meaning of the term 'institution' in the modern acceptance of the word. It means, I suppose, an undertaking formed to promote some defined purpose having in view generally the instruction or education of the public. It is the body (so to speak) called into existence to translate the purpose as conceived in the mind of the founders into a living and active principle."—Per Lord Macnaghten (Ibid.)

Applicable solely to religious, etc., purposes.—The income of the institution should be applicable solely to religious or charitable purposes before it can be exempted. It is not ordinarily the function of the Income-tax Officer to enquire whether in fact it is so applied. All that he has to see is whether under the rules and constitution of the institution the income is applicable. Where there is no clear condition in the rules of the institution, the fact that the income is not actually applied to the purpose may be evidence that it is not so applicable, and to that extent the Income-tax Officer may enquire into the application of the income. The word 'applicable' in clause (ii) is not so strict as the words "finally set apart for application" in clause (i).

"Voluntary contributions."—In the United Kingdom where income of charities as such is not exempt but only in respect of specified sources of income, the meaning of the expression has been the subject of discussion.

"It was said that the word 'payment' was synonymous with 'contribution', and that the word 'voluntary' did not mean gratuitous but meant 'given without compulsion'. . . . In my judgment, what is or is not a voluntary contribution must in each case depend on the object for which, and the object to which the contribution is made. In each case, it seems to me, it must be a question of fact. . . . To pay £1 to a benefit match of a professional cricketer for his own pocket would, I should say, be a voluntary contribution. To pay £1 to get access and right to a special seat upon the ground for the match, I should myself not call a voluntary contribution at all. . . . I decline altogether to attempt to give an exhaustive definition of what are or are not funds voluntarily contributed, for if I did, I should, as it appears to me, land myself in the same difficulties in which the learned Judges who decided the cases in question, as it appears to me, got themselves into" per Smith, J., in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. New University Club, 2 Tax Cases 279; 18 Q.B.D. 720.

The Maharajbagh Club, Nagpur, a Social Club, unsuccessfully claimed that subscriptions to it were voluntary and that it was an institution of public utility, The Maharajbagh Club, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, 5 I.T.C. 201.

Law in the United Kingdom.—Under Schedule A (property tax), exemption is given to (1) public buildings and offices belonging to any college or hall in any University (not occupied by any member or by any person paying rent); (2) public buildings, offices and premises belonging to any hospital, public school or alms-house (not occupied by any officer whose income amounts to £150 a year or more or by any person paying rent); (3) any building being the property of any literary or scientific institution which is used solely for the purpose of such institution and in which no payment is demanded or made for any instruction given there by lectures or otherwise (if the building is not occupied by any officer or by a person paying rent); (4) rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, etc., belonging to a hospital, public school or alms-house, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes in so far as the income is applied to charitable purposes (till 1921 this did not extend to the premises owned and occupied by the charity); (5) under Schedule C—Government and other securities—on stock belonging to charities. In 1921 exemptions were given (1) in respect of Schedule B—occupancy tax—in respect of lands occupied by a charity provided that the work in connection with the 'husbandry' is mainly carried on by the beneficiaries of the charity and the profits applied solely to the charity; (2) in respect of Schedule D—trading—if the work is mainly carried on by the beneficiaries of the charity and the profits solely applied to the charity. And in 1927, in respect of trade exercised in the course of the carrying out of the primary object of the charity, even if the trade is not carried on by the beneficiaries. As a result of these changes, many of the leading decisions in England have become obsolete.

As Pollock, M.R., put it, Brighton College v. Marriott, 10 Tax Cases 235; (1926) A.C. 192:—

"There is under the (United Kingdom) Income-tax Acts no general exemption for charities as such from income-tax. . . Unless the charity can justify a claim to the particular exemption allowed in respect of tax collected under the several Schedules it remains liable to the tax."

On the other hand in India there is a more or less general exemption in favour of charities leaving aside the limitations imposed by clause (1-a) added in 1939. English decisions are therefore of limited guidance in deciding what is or is not a charitable, etc., purpose; and in any case an exemption should be determined by the language of the Indian Act in that behalf and not with reference to English Statutes, In re Trustees of the Tribune, 1939 I.T.R. 415 (P.C.); All-India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.).

Under the English law all religious purposes are also charitable, In re White: White v. White, (1893) 2 Ch. 41, 52; Special Commissioners of Income-tax v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53, but certain purposes which would be religious according to non-Christian or rather non-Anglican standards would be 'superstitious' and not 'religious'. A technical meaning has been assigned to the words 'charitable purposes' by the Court of Chancery in England. Certain charitable objects were enumerated in the preamble to Statute 43 Elizabeth, c. 4, but the Courts have given a very wide interpretation to the words. The subjects are enumerated in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, as below:

"Relief of aged, impotent and poor people, maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools, and scholars in Universities, repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks and highways; education and preferment of orphans; relief, stock or maintenance for houses of correction, marriages of poor maids, supportation, aid and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen and persons decayed, relief or redemption of prisoners or captives, aid in case of any poor inhabitants concerning payment of fifteenths, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes."

The meaning of the words 'charitable purposes' in the income-tax laws was threshed out in Special Commissioners of Income-tax v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53.

Per Lord Macnaghten.—"In all English Statutes when there is no controlling context a technical meaning is attached to the word 'charity', and synonymous therewith is the word 'charitable' as used in such expressions as charitable trust, etc. . . . Charity in its legal sense compromise four principal divisions—trusts for the relief of poverty, trusts for the advancement of education, trusts for the advancement of religion, and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads. The trusts last referred to are not any the less charitable in the eye of the law, because they incidentally benefit the rich as well as the poor, as indeed every charity must do either directly or indirectly. . . . The (Income-tax) Act has nothing to do with casual alms-giving or charity of that sort nor indeed has it anything to do with charity which is not protected by a trust of a permanent character. The provisions of the Act are concerned with the revenues of established institutions—the income of charitable endowments. . . ." (1891) A.C. 531, 580, 583, 586.

Note that as regards the fourth head, the benefit of the community, there is no mention of poverty.

"The words in the preamble of 43 Elizabeth, c. 4, are not a definition of charitable cases but are a detailed statement of certain cases which are to be charitable and in dealing with the matter the course which the Court of Chancery has pursued has been to look at the enumeration of the charities in the statute and to include under the word 'charitable' any gift of funds for a public purpose which is analogous to those mentioned in the statute". Per Lord Wrenbury in Verge v. Somerville, (1924) A.C. 496, 502.

In a United States Sunday Act charity has been held to include "everything which proceeds from a sense of moral duty or kindness or humanity for the relief or comfort of another and without any regard to one's own benefit or pleasure", Doyle v. L. & B. R. R., 118 Mass. 197.

Question of law.—Whether a trust is charitable within the meaning of the statute or whether a particular object is one of general public utility is a question of law, though it is for the Commissioner to find and state the relevant facts. In re Trustees of the Tribunal, (1939) I.T.R. 415; Royal Choral Society v. Inland Revenue (C.A.), 1944 I.T.R. (Sup.) 13; dissenting from the decision of Lord Hanworth, M.R., in Yorkshire Agricultural Society v. Inland Revenue, 13 Tax Cas. 58, that the question is one of fact; All India Spinner's Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.).

Lands vested in trust for religious purposes.—Lands were vested in trustees to apply the rents and profits in maintaining (1) the missionary establishments among heathen nations of the Moravian Church; (2) a school for the children of ministers and missionaries; and (3) certain religious establishments denominated choir houses. Held, by Lord Watson, Herschell, Macnaghten and Morris (Halsbury, L.C., and Lord Bramwell dissenting) that the trust was one for "charitable purposes" within the meaning of the Income-tax Acts. In those Acts the words "charitable purposes" are to be interpreted, not according to their popular meaning, but according to their technical legal meaning, Special Commissioners of Income-tax v. Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53; (1891) A.C. 531. This is one of the leading cases on the subject.

Charity—Scottish Law.—In Wilson and others v. The Crown, 5 A.T.C. 378, the Scottish Court of Session held that in Scotland a charity should be construed according to Scottish and not English law.

Hospital—Paying patients.—In St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton v. Shearsmith, 2 Tax Cases 219; 19 Q.B.D. 624, a hospital received paying patients at remunerative prices and applied its surplus income to the extension and improvement of the hospital buildings. Held, that the surplus was profit assessable to income-tax as the institution was not 'charitable'. In Needham v. Bowers, 2 Tax Cases 360, an institution for the insane in which some patients paid sufficiently well for all the inmates to be supported without payment and which was therefore self-supporting was held to be not 'charitable' although it was founded by charitable donations and made no profit. In Cause v. Lunatic Hospital, Nottingham, 3 Tax Cases 39, however, an asylum with substantial charitable endowments which took in-patients at remunerative prices was considered to be 'charitable'. The difference between these decisions was founded on the fact that in the one case the institution was chiefly dependent on the fees while in the other it was so dependent on the endowments.

College or School—Receiving fees.—A college was built and endowed to enable young women to carry on their studies after leaving schools. Each student paid in fees £90 a year or upwards, the receipts from the endowment being as to fees in the proportion of about two to one. Held, that the college was not exempt as a "charity school", Southwell v. The Governors of Royal Holloway College, 3 Tax Cases 386; (1895) 2 Q. B. 487.

See also per Phillimore J., in Governors of Bradford Grammar School, 6 Tax Cases 136, following the tests laid down in Charterhouse School v. Lamarque, 2 Tax Cases 611 and Southwell v. The Governors of Holloway College, 3 Tax Cases 386.

"Now a school which is nearly self-supporting but has some assistance from endowments is not a charity school. A school which is almost entirely supported by endowments but gets some little assistance from fees paid by scholars is a charity school and in the same way a hospital which is almost entirely charitable is exempt as a hospital although it has a few paying patients. Per contra if the hospital is almost entirely self-supporting it is not exempt because it has some residual endowment. The whole matter therefore is a question of degree."

A school in which full fees are paid by the students, and the surplus is devoted to the improvement of the College, is not a 'charitable institution' but conducts a 'trade'—decided by the Court of Appeal in Marriott v. Brighton College, (1925) 1 K.B. 312, reversing the decision of Rowlatt, J.

Per Scrutton, L.J.—" When any person habitually and as a matter of contract, supplies money's worth for full money payment, he trades within the meaning of Schedule D. . . . This is not a case where persons subscribe to enable transactions to be carried on which could not be carried on by the commercial returns alone. . . ." This decision of the Court of Appeal was upheld by the House of Lords in Brighton College v. Marriott, 1926 A.C. 192; 10 Tax Cases 213.

Charities—Contingent and not exclusive.—Mr. Joseph Rank by an indenture made in March, 1917, settled upon trustees certain funds, to be held, together with the income thereof, upon trust "for the benefit of such persons, institutions or purposes as the said Joseph Rank shall by any writing under his hand or by will appoint". In default of any such appointment the trust funds and income were to be held by the trustees upon trust for the benefit of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. The whole of the income of the trust for the three years ended 5th April, 1918, 1919 and 1920 was applied by the trustees to certain charitable institutions in accordance with written directions given at various dates by Mr. Joseph Rank. The trustees applied for repayment of the Income-tax which had been deducted at the source from the trust income during the above three years on the ground that under the deed of trust the income in question was applicable to charitable purposes only and had been so applied. Held, that inasmuch as the settlor possessed, under the deed of settlement power to execute an appointment in favour of purposes that were not charitable, the deed did not create a trust for charitable purposes only, although ultimately powers were exercised by the settlor in favour of charity, Rex v. The Special Commissioners of Income-tax (Ex parte Rank's Trustees), 8 Tax Cases 286; 38 T.L.R. 256. This was followed in India in In re Probynabad Stud Farm, (1936) I.T.R. 114 (Lah.).

The first seven objects of a trust were non-charitable, and the balance, if any, of the funds and income of the trust was to be applied to charitable purposes. There was only a single block of income. Even before fully meeting the first seven objects, the trustees spent money on the eighth, i.e., the charitable object. It was held that since the prior obligations in respect of the first seven objects had not been met, the money actually applied to the charitable object was not "applicable to charitable purposes only". Lawrence v. Inland Revenue, 19 A.T.C. 171 (K.B.).

Common pastures—Grazing charges used for the benefit of.—The freemen of Bootham Ward had possessed certain rights of common pasture over certain lands. By a certain statute some of these lands were vested in the Mayor of the place, for the benefit of the freemen. Grazing charges were made upon 'non-freemen'; and these sums were used for the benefit of some of the widows of the freemen. Claim was made that the property was legally appropriated and applied for a charitable purpose. Held, that although an interpretation short of, and different from, the technical meaning assigned to the term 'charitable purposes', by the Courts and adopted by the House of Lords in the Income-tax case of Pemsel, 3 Tax Cases 53, should be given to the same term in the Corporation Duty Act, yet that interpretation should be a sufficiently wide and liberal one. . . . It would not, however, include a case in which the beneficiaries of the charity had no right to the benefits and received them only through the consent of the real owners, viz., the freemen, In re Bootham Strays: York Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Scott and others, 3 Tax Cases 134; (1892) 2 Q.B. 152.

Mutual Benefit Association.—The objects of an institution were to afford relief to decayed members in distress, sickness and old age, and to aid widows and protect children. Subscription was an essential condition of membership, but relief was claimable only where the circumstances were necessitous, and no members were entitled as of right to such relief, an absolute discretion in the matter vesting in the directorate. Held, that the institution was not a charitable institution, but substantially one for the mutual benefit of the subscribing members, who in the event of the directors misapplying the rules or declining to act upon them according to their proper construction, would have a right to redress in a Court of Equity, The Linen and Woollen Drapers, etc., Institution v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 Tax Cases 651; 58 L.T. 959.

Trade Societies—Benefit restricted to members.—Exemption claimed on behalf of a Scotch Incorporated Trade Society on the ground that its income was legally appropriated and applied to a "charitable purpose." Held, (1) that the meaning of the words "legally appropriated" is that the appropriation must be of such a kind as to create a legal obligation upon the part of the administrators of the property, to apply it in a particular manner, (2) that funds belonging to an incorporated body which are derived from entry moneys of members, and are solely applicable as pensions to decayed members, or widows of members, at the absolute discretion of a governing body, are not to be regarded as funds "legally appropriated and applied for any charitable purposes" within the meaning of the statute, The Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 Tax Cases 297. "Legally appropriated" in English Acts roughly corresponds to "held under trust or other legal obligation" in this sub-section.

A Chamber of Commerce is not a charitable institution even though it is not formed for the purpose of making profits and may be an object of general public utility in ordinary parlance. The fact that the Chamber maintains a hospital out of its funds will not in itself make the hospital or Chamber a charitable institution especially if the hospital is for the limited benefit of the members and their constituents. Chamber of Commerce, Hapur v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., (1936) I.T.R. 397; A.I.R. 1936 All. 764.

The Bombay Grain Merchants' Association the income of which had to be spent "as per the resolutions of the Committee . . . from time to time on matters of commercial and other small as well as big works of public utility" was held to be not charitable since the benefit was confined only to a section of the public, viz., those interested in Commerce, Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Bombay Grain Merchants' Association, (1938) I.T.R. 427. The ruling must not however be considered to imply that a charity must extend its benefits to all members of the public without any limitation.

Masonic Lodge.—A Grand Lodge of Masons claimed exemption in respect of the income of certain funds devoted to the relief of necessitous Masons, or their dependants, at the discretion of the administering bodies. Every Mason by whom, or by whose dependants, benefit was received from the funds, had to some degree contributed thereto through his Lodge, but the funds were largely derived from other sources than such contributions and the greater proportion of each individual Mason's contributions to his Lodge did not go to these funds. Held, that the exemption applied.

Per the Lord President.—The meaning of "legally appropriated and applied" does not necessarily mean that there never can be any change—as if a thing is fixed back but it means that the practical condition of the Fund is that it is so applied and that it is in terms of either the direction of the trust or the constitution of the body which owns it. Therefore the first thing to be got at is whether any particular portion of corporate property is really what may be called (to use more general words) dedicated to charity. The funds are entirely used for the relief of distress in some form or other, and accordingly, prima facie I think there would be no question but that they fall within the exemption.

Per Lord Mackenzie.—It appears to me that the question whether a particular fund falls within the exemption of the statute or not is largely a question of degree. If the objects of the Corporation are purely mutual benefit, if the individual corporators make their contributions as an investment, the case would be governed by the principles laid down in the Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow, 2 Tax Cases 297. From the bye-laws which govern the Tailors' Incorporation it appears that all that was left was for the mutual benefit of the individual members. So, too, in the English case Re The Linen and Woollen Drapers, etc., Institution, 2 Tax Cases 651, which was founded upon by the Crown, it appears from the opinion of Pollock, B., that the institution was a Mutual Benefit Society.

In the present case it does not appear to me that the contributions by individual Freemasons are of such a character or amount as to necessitate the Court arriving at the conclusion that the funds in question are not legally appropriated and applied for a charitable purpose. The individual pays not to any of these funds but to a daughter lodge makes these payments in order to become a Freemason. From the rules the consequence results that a small proportion of his contributions goes to these funds. That, however, is not the main object he has in view when he makes his contribution. He makes his contribution in order to share in the benefits of Freemasonry, and this is not confined to making payments from these funds, Grand Lodge, etc., of Masons, etc. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 6 Tax Cases 116; (1912) Sess. Cas. 1064.

- Temperance Institutions.—The Temperance Council of the Christian Churches of England and Wales, the principal object of which was united action to secure legislative and other temperance reform, was considered not to be a 'charitable' institution, but an institution established for political purposes as its object was to secure legislative reform, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. The Temperance Council, etc., 10 Tax Cases 748; 42 T. L.R. 618.

The object of a trust was "to assist the inhabitants of Falkirk by providing them with comfortable rooms where wholesome refreshments may be obtained, where they are free from the temptation of intoxicating liquors." The trustees maintained two cafes, in one of which prices were charged as in ordinary restaurants and in the other at lower rates in order to benefit the working classes. There were free reading and recreation rooms. The trustees avoided making profits as far as possible.

Held, that the promotion of temperance was a charitable object and that as the only way in which the trust could be given effect to was by the adoption of commercial methods, that feature should be ignored and that the trust should be exempt. Lord Sands however thought that if the Crown had shown that there was a separable branch working at a profit, it might have been different, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Falkirk Temperance Cafe Trust, 11 Tax Cases 353; (1927) Sess. Cas. 261.

Simplified Spelling Society.—A trust the fund of which was to be distributed to the Simplified Spelling Society or to any other similar society or association was not considered to be charitable, Trustees of Sir G. B. Hunter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 A.T.C. 149; 73 S.J. 284; 45 T.L.R. 344.

Anglo Swedish Society.—The promotion of a closer and more sympathetic understanding between countries is not a charitable purpose, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Anglo-Swedish Society, 16 Tax Cases 34; 47 T.L.R. 295.

Social Club.—"Establishing and maintaining an institute meeting place in London for the benefit of Welsh people in or near or visiting London with a view to creating a centre in London for promoting social, spiritual and educational welfare of Welsh people; and fostering the study of the Welsh language and of Welsh history, literature, music and art" were the purposes of an association which used its premises for public lectures, debates, music club and literary and educational classes, and also as a lounge, library, etc. The Special Commissioners held that the institution was essentially a social club, the charitable features being unimportant. The Court declined to interfere. Sir Howell Jones William's Trust v. Inland Revenue, (1945) 2 All.E.R. 236 (C.A.).

Foreign bond-holders.—A Society for the protection of holders of foreign securities is not charitable. It protects the interests of a limited class only even though in a broader sense, the country as a whole may benefit incidentally from the activities of the society. After all, such a society merely enables certain private investors to look after their interests better; and there is no charity in it. Corporation of Foreign Bond-holders v. Inland Revenue, 1944 (C.A.)

Widows and orphans of members—Society for the relief of.—According to its Charter the object of a Society was to relieve the widows and orphans of the deceased members who might need assistance; and according to the same Charter, the Society claimed to unite the advantages of a provident with those of a benevolent society, inasmuch as by a small yearly subscription the members were enabled to protect their widows and orphans from destitution should they need relief, and it was benevolent inasmuch as its benefits were conferred only to those in straitened circumstances. The funds of the Society were raised by interest of moneys, legacies and donations, and subscriptions of members. By far the greater portion of the members were in such circumstances that the dependants would not in the ordinary course require relief. Held, that the funds of the Society were solely devoted to the relief of individuals and that this was a 'charitable' purpose on the authority of the decisions given in the Court of Chancery, Spiller v. Maude, 32 Ch. D. 158, followed; Cunnack v. Edwards, 12 T.L.R. 614; Re Clarke, 1 Ch. D. 497, distinguished; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Medical Men, 11 Tax Cases 1; 42 T.L.R. 612.

A Society was established to help (1) members disabled by illness or accident and in needy circumstances; (2) the dependants of deceased members in necessitous circumstances; and (3) in the education of the children of disabled members. The members of the Society were also themselves eligible for relief and subscriptions and donations were received also from persons unconnected with the medical profession. This case was decided along with the case of the Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans, etc., and it was held in the same judgment that this Society also was 'charitable'. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Medical Charitable Society for the West Riding of Yorkshire, 11 Tax Cases 1; 42 T.L.R. 612.

Per Rowlatt, J.—A purely mutual society among very poor people whose dependants would be quite clearly always poor would not, I think, be a charity; it would be a business arrangement . . . (the beneficiaries in the present case) have not the right to anything; the funds are vested in trustees who have to do their duty, of course faithfully, but they have to select the objects with a view to making as far as their resources go, a due and fair relief of indigence. . . . The immateriality of the element of private subscription seems to be emphasised in the case of Spiller v. Maude, 32 Ch.D. 158.

Nursing facilities—Society giving.—An association whose object was the provision of nursing facilities to poor people had three classes of members paying subscriptions at different rates, the bulk of the members being in the lowest class. Facilities were given only to members, in most cases at less than cost, the deficit being met out of donations or income from investments of donations, etc., from the public. Held, that the association was charitable, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Peebleshire Nursing Association, 11 Tax Cases 335; (1927) Sess. Cas. 215.

Library.—A Corporate body possessed buildings which were occupied as a library, and owned also mortgages, railway shares, and bank deposits.

It claimed total exemption. Held, (1) that the Society's library was not property "legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts" (note the difference in the wording of the English and the Indian law); (2) that the income of the Society was exempt only to the limited extent that it was legally appropriated by contract to the perpetual endowment of a chair of conveyancing in the University of Edinburgh . . . ; (3) that the words "legally appropriated" did not mean "lawfully" appropriated, but that the appropriation was to be of such a kind as to be legally binding upon the parties, Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 Tax Cases 257. A building belonging to the Magistrates and Town Council of Dundee was used mainly as a Free Library, but in one of the rooms accommodation was afforded by special arrangement for the books belonging to a Subscription Library. These books were under the control of the Librarian of the Free Library, and after being a year in circulation among the subscribers were handed over to, and became the absolute property of, the Free Library. Held, that the building was not within the exemption in favour of buildings used solely for the purposes of a literary or scientific institution, Musgrave v. Magistrates and Town Council of Dundee, 3 Tax Cases 552; 34 Sc.L.R. 702.

A building was owned by a Municipal Corporation, and was maintained for the purposes of a Free Library under the provisions of the Public Libraries Act 1892. Held (by Lords Herschell, Macnaghten and Morris, Halsbury, L.C., dissenting), that the building was within the exemption from income-tax granted to Literary or Scientific Institutions Mayor, etc., of Manchester v. McAdam, 3 Tax Cases 491; (1896) A.C. 500.

University College.—The University College of North Wales was founded to provide instruction in all the branches of a liberal education except theology. It derived income from investments of which a part was appropriated specifically to various educational purposes, and part applied to the general purposes of the College. Held, that the College was a Corporation established for "charitable purposes" only within the meaning of the Income-tax Acts, that the revenues applied to the general purposes of the College were applied to "charitable purposes" only, and the College was entitled to exemption, The King v. Special Commissioners of Income-tax (Ex parte University College of North Wales), 5 Tax Cases 408; 25 T.L.R. 368.

Professional Associations.—Exemption claimed on the ground that the property and income of an Institution of Civil Engineers were legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. Held, by Lords Watson and Macnaghten (Lord Halsbury, L.C., dissenting), with reference to Corporation Duty, that the primary object of the Institution was the promotion of science in the abstract, and that the property and income were legally appropriated by Charter, and applied in fact to that object: that, if the further object of the advancement of the professional interest of members was to be also inferred, it was at least secondary to the main and chief object, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest, 3 Tax Cases 117. Following the above, the Court of Appeal held, with reference to income-tax, Institution of Civil Engineers v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 16 Tax Cases 158, that the institution was of a charitable nature, the professional benefits to the members being only incidental. That professional engineers alone could be members did not militate against the view that the primary object of the society was the advancement of knowledge; only professional engineers could possess the requisite scientific knowledge for membership. The question of construing the charter and bye-laws of a society is not a pure question of fact.

The Royal College of Surgeons was incorporated "for the advancement of the science of surgery within Her Majesty's Dominion". It granted various surgical qualifications, and was both an examining and teaching body in surgical subjects. Held, that the objects of the College were mainly professional; that it was not a 'scientific institution' and was therefore not entitled to exemption for buildings belonging to it, used as a library, museum, etc., for the purposes of the College. The question being a mixed one of fact and law, this judgment did not follow that of the House of Lords in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest, 3 Tax Cases 117; 15 App. Cas. 334.

Per Lord Adam.—" If, in the sense of the Act, the main and leading purpose of the institution is the advancement of science, it will not be the less entitled to the exemption claimed because it aids incidentally, consequentially, the promotion of professional purposes, and that appears to be the case, or very much so, of the Institution of Civil Engineers in London. On the other hand, if the main and leading object be that of advancing a profession, then that it may also incidentally and as a consequence of that, promote science will not (the less) make it other than a professional institution," Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh, 3 Tax Cases 173; 29 Sc.L.R. 620.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, a duty was imposed by way of compensation to the Revenue for Death Duties which obviously cannot be levied on Bodies Corporate and Unincorporate, the rate of Duty being five per cent. per annum on the net annual value, income and profits of real and personal property belonging to such bodies. "Property which, or the income or profits whereof shall be legally appropriated and applied for any charitable purpose or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts" [48 and 49 Vict., c. 51, section 11, sub-sections (2) and (4)] (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885) was exempt; and the Royal College of Surgeons claimed exemption from this duty. Held, that the College had two main objects neither of which was subsidiary to the other: (1) The promotion of the science of surgery: (2) The promotion of the practice and encouragement of surgery including the interests of those practising surgery as a profession, and including also the examination of students and others to qualify for practice or honours in surgery. There was no legal obligation either to apply the property or the income to the first main object, or not to apply them to the second main object, and as there was no appropriation by the college by conveyance, declaration of trust or otherwise, there was no "legal appropriation" for a purpose exempting from duty. Neither was the property and income brought into charge "applied" so as to exempt it from duty, The Royal College of Surgeons of England v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 4 Tax Cases 344; (1899) 1 Q.B. 871.

The objects of the Medical Council in England were to keep a Register of Medical Practitioners and regulate their conduct, to supervise and control medical studies and examinations and to prepare and to revise from time to time the British Pharmacopœia. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the purpose of the Council was not charitable, General Medical Council v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 A.T.C. 121; 13 Tax Cases 819.

Following the above case it was held that the General Nursing Council for Scotland the purpose of which was partly educational and partly the professional advantage of registered nurses was not charitable, The General Nursing Council for Scotland v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Tax Cases 645; 8 A.T.C. 384.

An association does not however cease to be one with a charitable object merely because incidentally and in order the better to carry out the charitable object it is necessary to cover certain special benefits to members, see per Atkin, L.J., in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Yorkshire Agricultural Society, 13 Tax Cases 58; (1928) 1 K.B. 611, reaffirmed by the C. of A. in Geologists' Association v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 7 A.T.C. 298; 14 Tax Cases 271.

The Honourable company of Master Mariners was held to be of the nature of a craft guild and not a charitable (literary or scientific) institution because its main purpose was to set up "a central body representative of and qualified to represent the senior officers of the Merchant Navy on all occasions and in all matters and things relating to or affecting the Merchant Navy or the interest or status of its officers." It was claimed for the society that this object was really machinery to secure other objects which were charitable, Society of Master Mariners v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 17 Tax Cases 298.

An Association formed for the promotion of the interests of the teaching profession in Preparatory Schools, though it also furthered the advancement of education was considered to be not 'charitable', R. v. Special Commissioners (Ex parte the Incorporated Association of Preparatory Schools), 10 Tax Cases 73; 41 T.L.R. 651.

The Headmasters' Conference—an Association for the promotion of the interests of the teaching profession, the settlement of disputes affecting members of the profession, etc., though the association was interested in the cause of secondary education generally, was similarly treated to be not 'charitable', R. v. Special Commissioners (Ex parte the Headmasters' Conference), 10 Tax Cases 73; 41 T.L.R. 651.

Per Lord Eldon in Morice v. The Bishop of Durham, 10 Vesey 532—quoted in R. v. Special Commissioners (Ex parte Rank's Trustees), 8 Tax Cases 286 and again in the Headmasters' Conference case above. "The question is whether, if upon the one hand he might have devoted the whole to purposes in this sense charitable, he might not equally, according to the intention, have devoted the whole to purposes benevolent and liberal and yet not within the meaning of charitable purposes as this Court construes these words."

The mutual intellectual benefit of members is not a charitable purpose; otherwise every club could be a charitable institution. A charity implies, as a necessity, work for the benefit of others. The nature of the purpose is a question of fact, Geologists' Association v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Tax Cases 271; 7 A.T.C. 298.

The Aberdeen Medico-Chirurgical Society was held not to be a literary or scientific institution, since, despite its library and the facilities for interchange of ideas on medical and scientific subjects, it was essentially a professional society to which the other features were only incidental, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Aberdeen Medico-Chirurgical Society, 16 Tax Cases 237. Where there are two main purposes, viz., (a) public benefit, and (b) creation of a professional body, and neither can be considered to be subsidiary to the other, the institution is not charitable, Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 17 A.T.C. 587 (Ir.). The Madras Bar Council was allowed exemption on its income from investments earmarked for legal education but not on its income from enrolment and examination fees. 1943 I.T.R. 1.

It should be remembered, that according to the Indian Law where a trust is only partly charitable, the part of income which is applied or set apart for charitable purposes is exempt. But the trust should clearly lay down that a part is charitable and it is not sufficient that the trustee spends a part on charity at his own discretion.

Choral Society.—The Royal Choral Society which sought no profit and trained choir singers (who were not paid for their singing) was held to be charitable, the object being educational. Per Lord Greene, M.R. "It was said the public goes to be entertained, the singers sing in order to have the pleasure of singing, and the ten gentlemen (members) encourage and assist these operations in order to have the pleasure of running a choir and listening to the performance Curiously enough, some people find pleasure in providing education. Still more curiously some people find pleasure in being educated but the element of pleasure in these processes is not the purpose" but a by-product which is necessarily there. Further, education need not be confined to the education of the executants, i.e., the singers in this case and can cover the education of public taste also. Royal Choral Society v. Inland Revenue, 1944 I.T.R. (Sup.) 13.

Political trusts.—In the Bonar Law Trust Memorial case, 12 A.T.C. 164; 17 Tax Cases 508, the Court affirmed that the test in all such cases is what is the dominant purpose of the trust. A trust which was in truth for educational purposes mainly would not cease to be such merely because the trustees were a political party. On the other hand, a trust for the propagation of political principles would not become educational merely because it simulated or adopted educational methods.

The same view has been taken in India also, see In re Trustees of the Tribune, 1939 I.T.R. 415 (P.C.); and following this, In re Tilak Memorial Fund, 1942 I.T.R. 26 (Bom.), in which two of the objects were not charitable, viz., political propaganda of a particular kind, and "any object" at the discretion of the trustees, "of national or international importance" and the trustees had absolute discretion as to the money to be spent on the several objects. On the other hand, even if an association is set on foot by a political organisation and is closely connected with it, the connection with the political organisation will not make the object of the associations any the less charitable, if its real object is the relief of poverty. All India Spinners' Association v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, 1944 I.T.R. 482 (P.C.).

Technical education.—A college imparting technical education in all branches of the woollen industry and maintained mostly out of subscriptions from woollen manufacturers, was held to be an educational institution, Scottish Woollen Technical College v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (C. of S.), 11 Tax Cases 139. On the other hand, 'flying' is not 'education' even though it may be for the good of the community, and in any case where the benefits are confined to the members of a club, there can be no charitable purpose, however easy it might be to become a member of the club, Scottish Flying Club v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 20 Tax Cas. 1; (1935) S.C. 817.

Agricultural Society.—A society, numbering about 3,000 members, unincorporated and without any deed of trust, held annual shows and interested itself generally in the improvement of agriculture, including inter alia the improvement of agricultural lands. The income comprised gate money, subscriptions, etc., and the excess of income over expenditure was invested. Held, by the Court of Appeal, that there was a charitable purpose, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Yorkshire Agricultural Society, 6 A.T.C. 862; (1928) 1 K.B. 611. The law, however, has been amended in the United Kingdom in respect of such income of agricultural societies. See section 23 of the United Kingdom Finance Act of 1924.

Though 'livestock' may conceivably include hounds, fox-hunting is not directly beneficial to the community and a Foxhound Show Society is not therefore charitable, Peterborough Royal Foxhound Show Society v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 20 Tax Cas. 249; (1936) 2 K.B. 497.

Col. Probyn of Probyn's Horse obtained in 1864 certain lands on lease from Government (purpose not stated in lease), and with these lands and certain funds from various sources founded a stud farm. There was no trust-deed, but the main object of the farm was to supply remounts to the regiment and to improve horse-breeding. The bulk of the horses were sold to the Army, and those unfit for the Army were sold to outsiders. The officer commanding the regiment administered the farm and he had discretion as to spending the funds, e.g., a large sum was once paid as bonus to the regiment and other sums had been given for such items as a farewell party to the Commander-in-chief and a wedding party. It was held that the purpose of the trusts was not charitable, In re Probynabad Stud Farm, 1936 I.T.R. 114 (Lah.).

Convalescent Home.—A home established for the benefit of members of the drapery and allied trades obtained its income from the original endowment and other investments, from donations and subscriptions from concerns in the trades and from payments by visitors. The persons using the home were convalescents from illness, persons requiring rest and change of air and persons taking a holiday; and the last class had to pay higher rates than the others. The visitors were admitted either on the recommendation of the donor and subscriber firms or on special letters of introduction.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, following Re Estlin, 72 L.J. 687, and Re Gardon, (1914) 1 Ch. 662, that the home was charitable, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Trustees of Robert's Marine Mansions, 11 Tax Cases 425; 43 T.L.R. 270.

Benevolent Society—Commercial methods.—In Trustees of Psalms and Hymns v. Whitwell, 3 Tax Cases 7, it was held that the business of selling a hymn book was a trade, even though the resulting profits were distributed among widows and orphans of ministers and missionaries. In Religious Tract and Book Society v. Forbes, 3 Tax Cases 415, in which the society, whose primary object was the diffusion of religious literature, incidentally carried on a book-selling shop it was considered to that extent to be engaged in a trade. At the same time it was held that a colportage agency carried on by the same society in which the chief business was not so much that of pushing the sale of the goods as that of administering religious advice was not a trade.—Per Lord President Robertson:

“While . . . the establishment and conduct of the colportage all rest upon the same ultimate motive, yet at the same time the two operations seem to be essentially distinguished. The shops are simply bookseller's shops—the other is a combination of the sale of books with a missionary enterprise.”

A Society formed for the improvement, spiritual, mental, social and physical, of young men, carried on a Restaurant, as well as Educational Classes, Gymnasium and Publication Department; the restaurant was carried on on the usual commercial principles, and was open to the public. Held, that the Association was liable to income-tax on the profit made by the Restaurant

Per Ridley, J.—“I cannot escape from the conclusion that the object is to carry on a Restaurant as a trade consistently with the other objects of the Association. The Association would indeed carry it on even without a profit, with a view no doubt of benefiting the other objects of the Association; yet I think it is carried on as a ‘trade’. It is conducted on the usual commercial principles. . . .”, Grove v. Young Men's Christian Association, 4 Tax Cases 613; 88 L.T. 696.

These three decisions were cited with approval in Coman v. Rotunda Hospital, 7 Tax Cases 517; (1921) 1 A.C. 1, in which it was held that a hospital which let its rooms for entertainments and meetings was carrying on a trade. See also Brighton College v. Marriott, 10 Tax Cases 213. These decisions, however, are partly obsolete even in the United Kingdom, in view of the amendments in the law there in 1921 and 1927. So far as India is concerned these decisions are inapplicable if the profits are, under trust or legal obligation, to be used for charitable or religious purposes within the meaning of the Indian Act. See earlier notes on this sub-section and in particular, In re Trustees of Tribune, 1939 I.T.R. 415 (P.C.).

It was held, however, in Commissioner of Income-tax v. Thevara Patasala, 2 I.T.C. 171, by the Madras High Court, following the above decisions in the United Kingdom and the decision of the Allahabad High Court in In re Lachmandas Naraindas, 1 I.T.C. 378 (the latter, however, was not based on the United Kingdom rulings), that a business conducted by a charity should be held liable to income-tax if it competed with other businesses that paid income-tax. These decisions, even if they have not been formally overruled are of little authority in the face of the decisions of the Privy Council in the Tribune Case, 1939 I.T.R. 415 and the All India Spinners' Association Case, 1944 I.T.R. 482.

Property vested in charity—Not exempt before it is settled.—Exemption can be claimed only in respect of the income arising after the property vests in the charity. Under section 3, an assessee is to be assessed on the income, profits and gains of the previous year, and the fact that certain income received during the current financial year is derived from property held upon trust for charitable purposes, does not prevent the liability of the assessee to be taxed on such income received during the previous year before the property was settled, Commissioner of Income-tax v. Bai Jerbai Nowrosji Wadia, 1 I.T.C. 255.

If a charitable trust arises out of a will, it takes effect, in the absence of anything to the contrary, from the date of the testator's death; and income which accrued before that date is not exempt even though actually paid to the trust, Marie Celeste Samaritan Society v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 11 Tax Cases 226; 43 T.L.R. 23.

Mr. Denzil Thomson died on the 15th November, 1914, leaving the residue of his estate to Dr. Barnardo's Homes National Incorporated Association. The testator's next-of-kin contested the will, and the proceedings were compromised by the Association making over to the next-of-kin one-third of the residuary estate. The proceedings delayed the division of the residuary estate, and the investments constituting and representing the same, remained under the control of the Executors until May, 1916, between which date and December, 1916, two-thirds of the investments were transferred to the Association and one-third to the testator's next-of-kin. The income arising from the investments received under deduction from such income during the period between the date of the testator's death and the date of transfer by the Executor amounted to £498-0-11.

The Association applied for re-payment of two-thirds of that sum, viz., £332-0-7, as being the income-tax on income payable to the Association, and applicable, and in fact applied, by it solely for charitable purposes.

Held, (i) that the assent of the Executors to the bequest to the Association of the residue of the estate did not relate back to the date of the testator's death; (ii) following the decision in Lord Sudeley v. Attorney-General, (1897) A.C. 11, that, prior to the ascertainment of the residue, the Association, as residuary legatee, had no interest in the testator's property, that the taxed income of the estate prior to such ascertainment was income of the Executors, and that it was not received by them as trustees on behalf of the Association; and (iii) that the Association was, therefore, not entitled to claim re-payment of the income-tax deducted from the income, The King v. Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income-tax Acts (Ex parte Dr. Barnardo's Homes National Incorporated Association), (1921) 2 A.C. 7; 7 Tax Cases 646.

The law in the United Kingdom was however altered as a consequence of this decision by section 30 of the Finance Act of 1922.

(iii) The income of local authorities except income from a trade or business carried on by the authority so far as that income is not income arising from the supply of a commodity or service within its own jurisdictional area.

Local authorities.—The income of local authorities had been completely exempt in India till 1939 when the clause was amended as above on the lines of the law in the United Kingdom. As regards profits from within the jurisdictional area it has been held in the United Kingdom that such profits are not true profits but a surplus on excess paid by the persons constituting the local body, viz., the citizens, see Dublin Corporation v. MacAdam, 2 Tax Cases 387.

A "Local Authority" is defined in section 3 (28) of the General Clauses Act as a "municipal committee, District Board, etc., legally entitled to, or entrusted by the Government with the control or management of a municipal or local fund." The words "legally entitled to or entrusted by the Government with" should be construed to mean "entitled by the law of British India to or entrusted by a Government authority in British India with". It follows therefore that there can be no "local authority" outside British India within the meaning of clause (iii) of sub-section (3) of section 4 of the income-tax Act. This view does not of course apply to local authorities in British administered areas in Indian States to which the Income-tax Act and the General Clauses Act have been applied. (Income-tax Manual).

Trade or business.—In view of the definition in section 2 (4), the words "trade or" are superfluous.

Computation of income.—A local authority was authorised and required to supply water and to obtain payment from the persons to whom the water was supplied, but such payment was by law restricted to an amount which was insufficient to meet the cost of supplying the water; and the authority was empowered to meet the deficit by levying a general rate through other local authorities. The revenue so received was held by Macnaghten, J., not to be a trading receipt but the Court of Appeal decided the contrary. The sums paid by the local authority to other local authorities, whether under 'precepts' or not, for water supplies to it were considered to be part of the price of the water, and therefore held to be trading expenditure, Ostime v. Pontypridd and Rhodda Joint Waterboard, 1944 C.A.

(iv) Interest on securities which are held by, or are the property of, any Provident Fund to which the Provident Funds Act, 1925, applies.

History.—The exemption in this sub-section was given by Notification before 1918 when it was incorporated in the Act.

Exemption of Provident Funds.—This clause which applies only to funds covered by the Act of 1925 exempts the interest on securities held by certain provident funds, while under section 15 (1) contributions paid by subscribers to such funds up to a certain limit are exempt from the tax. The accumulated balances paid out of those funds are capital in the hands of the recipients, see Shaw Wallace & Co. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, (P.C.) 59 Cal. 1343; 59 I.A. 206; also perhaps interest thereon though the question is arguable.

The exemption granted to Provident Funds which comply with the provisions of the Provident Insurance Societies Act, 1912, or which were exempted from the provisions of that Act was withdrawn by the Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1924 (XI of 1924). Provident Insurance Societies to which the Provident Insurance Societies Act, 1912, applies, or which have been exempted from its provisions and which were in existence before the 1st April, 1924, continue, however, under executive instructions to enjoy the exemptions under section 4 (3) (iv) and section 15 (1), to which they were entitled under Act XI of 1922, before it was amended by the Act XI of 1924.

As regards "recognised provident funds", see section 4 (3) (ix), section 15 and chapter IX-A.

"Securities".—The words "interest on securities" do not bear the same restricted meaning as in section 8 of the Act. In section 4 (3) (iv), they cover interest on a mortgage. Nor is the meaning for example, restricted to the ordinary limited legal sense, in which it must always have reference to a loan. Provident Funds are entitled to invest in any trustee security, and it has not been the intention of Government to discriminate between the various classes of investments which are thus legally authorised. The word "securities" in section 4 (3) (iv) is therefore to be interpreted as covering all securities mentioned in section 20 of the Indian Trusts Act. (Income-tax Manual.)

Provident Funds to which this clause applies.—The Provident Funds Act, 1925 (XIX of 1925), applies to all Government and Railway Provident Funds and to such provident funds as may have been established for the benefit of its employees by any local authority as defined in the Local Authorities Loans Act, 1914, to which the Local Government may by notification extend the Provident Funds Act.

Court of Wards servants.—In an estate under the Court of Wards the officers are appointed by Government; their salaries are fixed by them whose orders the officers must obey. The receipt of salaries from the estate merely means that Government direct the officers to help themselves to a limited extent from the estate funds, i.e., Government direct the Ward to pay for a particular class of Government employees. Whether a person is an employee of a particular authority for the purpose of the Provident Funds Act depends on whether membership of the fund is controlled by that authority and not on from which sources the employee's salary is paid or on the legal relationship between him and that authority. Held, accordingly that a servant of the Court of Wards is a Government servant for the purpose of the Provident Funds Act, Rutherford v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, 5 I.T.C. 71; 10 Patna 315; A.I.R. 1931 Patna 451.

(v) * * * *

History.—This clause which ran as below was deleted in 1939 as being superfluous:

"any capital sum received in commutation of the whole or a portion of a pension, or in the nature of consolidated compensation for death or injuries, or in payment of any insurance pley, or as the accumulated balance at the credit of a subscriber to any such Provident Fund."

Rulings.—Accumulated bonuses paid out of a provident fund are of the nature of capital irrespective of the employee's legal right to them and even though the bonuses are not of the nature of a windfall but are paid on a plan. There is no essential difference between such a payment and a sum payable under a policy of insurance on its maturity, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Fletcher, (1937) I.T.R. 428 (P.C.).

It was ruled in Rutherford's Case, 10 Pat. 315; 5 I.T.C. 71 by the Patna High Court that as in the case of terms like 'penalty' and 'liquidated damages', the real nature of a transaction should be examined, and that merely calling a payment a gratuity will not make it such if it is really of the nature of a commuted pension. A lump sum actuarially equated to a hypothetical pension is a commuted payment of pension for the purpose of this clause. It is not necessary that a pension should be first sanctioned, or even claimable as of right. Further the concession given by this clause is not confined to pensions granted by Government.

A lump sum gratuity in lieu of pension was held to be taxable in Balaji Rao v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 8 I.T.C. 80; but the ruling is of doubtful authority in view of the Privy Council rulings in Shaw Wallace and Co.'s Case, 59 I.A. 206 and Fletcher's Case, (1937) I.T.R. 428.

(vi) any special allowance, benefit or perquisite specifically granted to meet expenses wholly and necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of an office or employment of profit.

History.—In the 1886 Act, the corresponding provision was partly contained in the definition of 'salary' which ran as below:—

"Includes allowances, fees, commissions, perquisites or profits received in lieu of or in addition to a fixed salary in respect of an office or employment of profit, but subject to any rules which may be prescribed in this behalf, it does not include travelling, tentage, horse or sumptuary allowances, or any other allowance granted to meet specific expenditure."

Perquisite or benefits not capable of conversion into money.—

The provision in section 3 (2) (ix) of the Act of 1918 that "any perquisite or benefit which is neither money nor reasonably capable of being converted into money" was not liable to tax, was omitted in 1922. At the same time section 7 (1) of the Act was amended to provide for the taxation of perquisites in the form of rent-free residences. The old provision was based on Tennant v. Smith, (1892) A.C. 150, referred to later.

The following instructions are found in the Income-tax Manual:—

All perquisites received by an employee in lieu of or in addition to salary or wages, are liable to the tax. House-rent allowances and the value of rent-free quarters, form additions to the remuneration of an employee; and even where residence in a particular town or building is necessary for the proper performance of the employee's duties, such allowances or perquisites cover expenses of a personal character which the employee would otherwise have to incur. They do not therefore "meet expenses wholly and necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of an office or employment of profit", and are therefore not covered by the exemption in section 4 (3) (vi) of the Act, and are taxable.

Two conditions have to be fulfilled before the exemption specified in section 4 (3) (vi) can apply. The expenses incurred by the employee must be wholly and necessarily incurred in the performance of his duties as an employee, and the allowances or perquisites must have been granted by the employer with the said purpose of meeting the extra expense thus caused to the employee, and the extra expense only. It is thus a question of fact in each case whether a house-rent allowance or the value of rent-free quarters, is exempt from the tax, but the following examples are given for the purpose of general illustration:—

(a) A currency officer is granted rent-free quarters in his currency office. Even though his residence in that office is necessary for the proper performance of his duties, he will be liable to the tax on the value of his rent-free quarters, since he would in any case have had to provide himself with a residence, and the perquisite does not therefore meet expenses wholly incurred in the performance of the duties of an office or employment of profit.

(b) A firm in Calcutta makes a practice of providing its employees with rent-free quarters, and houses some of its employees in its business premises as resident clerks. The employees of the firm, including the resident clerks, will, as in the previous case, be liable to Income-tax on the value of their rent-free quarters.

Such perquisites as (for example) tiffin, domestic services or the value of passages by rail or steamer provided by employers free of charge for their employees are not taxable, but passage money paid in India by an employer to his employee to enable him to go on leave is liable to tax.

Rewards granted to officials for passing compulsory examinations must be distinguished from grants made to assist candidates to meet the expenses of preparing for such examinations. Such tuition grants fall under section 4 (3) (vi) of the Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922) and are not liable to tax even if they are paid only to the successful candidates.

Wholly and necessarily.—The words 'wholly and necessarily' are stricter than the words 'wholly and exclusively' used in section 10 (2), and the word "solely" in section 12 (2). In the case of salaried persons a deduction may be made only if the allowance is given for meeting expenditure which is not only wholly incurred in the performance of the person's duties but also necessarily incurred. See first proviso to sub-section (1) of section 7—where the words "wholly, necessarily and exclusively" are used.

Expenses.—Means actual disbursements, not allowances for loss of time, (Jones v. Comorthen), 1 O.L.J. Ex. 401. The position is made clear, in the sub-section, by the word "incurred". "Incurred" can only mean that there has been, or would be an actual outgo, and notional expenditure cannot be 'incurred' except by express provision to that effect. Actual outgo however, need not be in cash.

Perquisite.—The word dates from feudal times, and meant casual income arising to a feudal chief (see Stroud). The meaning of the word was considered in Tennant v. Smith, (1902) A.C. 150; 3 Tax Cases 158 which decided that a 'perquisite' should be capable of conversion into money before it can be taxed. This was the law in India also till 1922; see notes under section 7 (1).

In MacDonald v. Shand, 8 Tax Cases 420 in which the question was whether a 'perquisite' should be taxed on the year's income as part of salary or on an average of three years (this question cannot arise in India), Lord Birkenhead said: "Infinite disputation is possible as to what, in different contexts, may be the proper connotation of a term such as 'perquisite.' In one context it may have a bad or an irregular connotation; in another it may be normally ranged under payments which are both frequent and regular in commercial transactions."

According to Murray's Dictionary, the word means "any casual emolument, fee or profit attached to an office or position in addition to salary or wages".

Rent-free residences.—This clause applies only to cases in which the assessee is actually put to expense and is recouped therefor. Accordingly, the value of a rent-free residence given by an employer to enable the employee to entertain the employer's guests is not exempt from tax, Abbot v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar and Orissa, (1935) 9 I.T.C. 9. As regards the law in the United Kingdom, see Tennant v. Smith, 1892 A.C. 150 and other rulings referred to later.

Lambardari fees.—Such fees (in the Punjab) are remuneration for collecting land revenue, and whether or not the out-of-pocket expenses of the lambardar can be deducted from such fees, the fees as a whole are not covered by this clause, Conville v. Commissioner of Income-tax, (1936) I.T.R. 137 (Lah.).

Uniform grant.—A detective-sergeant in the employment of a Municipal Corporation, was assessed on his salary which included a cash allowance given to him for clothing in lieu of free supply of uniform. The clothing which the officer must purchase with the case allowance was specified, and was subject to the approval of a superior officer. The allowance for clothing was not regarded as income for superannuation purposes, and, apart from this allowance, detective-officers received the same rates of pay as uniformed officers. Held, that the allowance was a payment accruing to the assessee by reason of his office and was assessable to income-tax, Fergusson v. Noble, 7 Tax Cases 176. The Court suggested, however, that it would only be fair to permit such detectives to deduct from their income the expenditure incurred by them in making clothes suitable for their duties, and this is reported to be allowed in practice.

Provident Scheme—Employee's Contribution.—A sum of £35 was placed to the credit of an assessee—a teacher in Dulwich College, under the Provident Scheme for the Assistant Masters of the College. Of this sum, no part was payable until the assessee left the College, or until his decease; he could not raise money on it; and as regards one moiety, payment was contingent on a certain length of service and on good conduct. This moiety represented the employer's contribution; and the other moiety the employee's, his salary having been raised correspondingly. Held, that the whole sum (both the employer's and employee's contributions) was a taxable addition to the assessee's salary, Smyth v. Stretton, 5 Tax Cases 36. Apart from the difference between the English and the Indian Acts, the correctness of this ruling was doubted by the Rangoon High Court, Bombay Burma Trading Corporation, Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, (1933) I.T.R. 152. The scheme of the Acts both in this country and in the United Kingdom is to tax actual and not potential sources of income. The amendment of section 7 in 1939 which taxes salaries on an 'accrued' instead of a 'cash' basis would not seem to affect the position in this respect.

Boarding—Cost of.—A man and his wife were employed at an asylum at separate fixed salaries payable weekly, but were given board, lodging, etc., the necessary deductions being made from their wages. Held, that the assessee should be assessed on their gross income.

Per Rowlatt, J.—"These (i.e., cases like Tennant v. Smith), are the cases in which there is a fixed salary plus something else. (But) if we get a case where a person is paid a salary and . . . out of that salary has to pay a counter amount to secure himself some necessities.

. . . there is no relevance in the question whether what he gets by the counter payment can be disposed of for money . . .

He has been paid a salary, and what he does with the salary is immaterial", Cordy v. Gordon, 9 Tax Cases 304; (1925) 2 K.B. 276.

A was entitled to pay at £30 plus free board, lodging, washing and uniform valued at £40 per annum. Later on, the free allowances with the exception of the uniform were abolished, and an increased rate of pay given, but the cost of food, etc., was deducted from the pay every week. A claimed that the board, lodging, etc., were not convertible into money and that only the net money received after deduction for food, etc., should be taxed. The General Commissioners held that A had not entered into any fresh contract for service when the method of remunerating him was changed and that his claim was correct. Held, that the Commissioners were wrong and that the gross salary should be taxed, Machon v. McLoughlin, (1926) 11 Tax Cases 83; 5 A.T.C. 381 (C.A.); Cordy v. Gordon, 9 Tax Cases 304; Bell v. Gribble, 4 Tax Cases 522; (1903) 1 K.B. 517, followed.

Per Rowlatt, J.—If a person is paid a wage with some advantage thrown in, you cannot add the advantage to the wage for the purpose of taxation unless that advantage can be turned into money. . . . But when you have a person paid a wage with a necessity—the contractual necessity if you like—to expend that wage in a particular way, then he must pay tax upon the gross wage, and no question of alienability or inalienability arises . . . the question is whether he is paid a wage, part of which he has to expend in a particular way by way of counter account, or whether it is that he receives as his wages the net sum after allowing these amounts. . . .” (Confirmed by the Court of Appeal.)

Clergyman—Expenses of.—A minister of the Church of Scotland was allowed to deduct—(1) expenses actually incurred in visiting the members of his congregation living beyond the limits of his parish; (2) travelling expenses incurred in the discharge of duties imposed on him by his ecclesiastical superiors; (3) cost of stationery; and (4) communion expenses; but not the cost of books or the rent of the part of his house used for his work, Charlton v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, C.S., 1890—27 Sc.L.R. 647.

A clergyman claimed deduction in respect of his expenditure on (1) Horse and Carriage, (2) Communion Elements, (3) Process of Augmentation, and (4) Pulpit Supply during holidays. The Commissioners had only allowed so much of the amounts claimed under heads (1) and (2) as they were satisfied had in fact been incurred “wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duty”, and had altogether disallowed the amounts claimed under heads (3) and (4). Held, as regards (1) and (2) that the amount allowable was a question of fact, and that the finding of the Commissioners thereon was final, and, as regards (3) and (4) that the allowance had been rightly refused, Jardine v. Gillespie, 5 Tax Cases 263; (1907) Sess. Cas. 77.

The expenses incurred by a curate removing from one curacy to another which he had taken up, were held not to be expenses incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties as a curate, and were, therefore, inadmissible as deductions in arriving at his liability to income-tax, W. Friedson v. The Rev. F. H. Glyn-Thomas, 8 Tax Cases 302.

Domestic servant—Cost of employing.—A man and his wife were appointed master and mistress of a school on a joint salary. The master claimed a deduction of £30 in respect of the cost of a domestic servant employed to carry on the duties of his household while his wife was engaged at the school. Held, that this was not an expense incurred in the performance of the duties of the offices of master and mistress of the school, Bowers v. Harding, 3 Tax Cases 22; (1891) 1 Q.B. 560.

Motor-cycle—Cost of—For going to place of work.—A store-keeper employed by a shipbuilding company contended that, owing to the abnormal shortage of houses in that town, he was compelled to take a house at some distance outside, and claimed to deduct from his salary the expenses of maintaining a motor-cycle to get to his work. The General Commissioners on appeal allowed the deduction sought; but the Crown appealed against this. Held, that the expenses in question were not incurred in the performance of the duties of the office, and that the deduction claimed was not admissible, Andrews v. Astley, 8 Tax Cases 589.

Recorder—Travelling expenses of.—A member of the Bar who resided and practised in London was appointed as Recorder of Portsmouth. He claimed as deductions from his assessable income the expenses incurred by him in travelling from London to Portsmouth and back, and hotel expenses at Portsmouth. Held, that the deductions were inadmissible.

Per Lord Chancellor Cave.—" . . . They are incurred, not because the appellant holds the office of Recorder of Portsmouth, but because, living and practising away from Portsmouth, he must travel to that place before he can begin to perform his duties as Recorder, and, having concluded those duties, desires to return to his home. They are incurred not in the course of performing those duties but partly before he enters upon them, and partly after he has fulfilled them. . . .

"A man must eat and sleep somewhere, whether he has or has not been engaged in the administration of justice. Normally he performs those operations in his own home, and if he elects to live away from his work so that he must find board and lodging away from home, that is, by his own choice, and not by reason of any necessity arising out of his employment; nor does he, as a rule, eat or sleep in the course of performing his duties, but either before or after their performance. . . ."

Per Lord Blanesburgh.—" . . . Undoubtedly its (r. 9, Sch. E) most striking characteristic is its jealously restricted language, some of it repeated apparently to heighten its effect. . . .", Ricketts v. Colquhoun, 10 Tax Cases 118; (1926) A.C. 1.

On the analogy of the above case, it was held in Nalder v. Walters, 9 A.T.C. 251, that the cost of a telephone kept at an employee's residence to facilitate his receiving instructions from his employers is not an admissible deduction from his taxable income. On the other hand if the employee incurs, out of his pocket, expenditure over and above any allowance given by his employers for the purpose of discharging his duties, such extra expenditure can be deducted.

Perquisites—Not capable of conversion into money.—A banking company assigned to its agent, as a residence, a portion of the bank premises occupied by them, in respect of which they were assessed to income-tax. The agent was required to reside in the buildings as the servant of the bank, and for the purpose of performing the duty which he owed to his employers. He was forbidden to sublet the residence. Held, that the value of the residence was not an emolument of office in respect of which the agent was chargeable with income-tax; and was not to be included in estimating the total amount of the agent's income, for the purposes of a claim of abatement, Tennant v. Smith, 3 Tax Cases 158; (1892) A.C. 150 (H. of L.).

A Minister of the Free Church of Scotland claimed that the annual value of the manse occupied by him which was vested in trustees and which he could not let was not to be taken into account in calculating his total income for the purposes of his abatement. Held, that the annual value of the manse did not form part of his income for such purposes, M'Dougall v. Sutherland, 3 Tax Cases 261; 31 Sc.L.R. 630.

(These decisions are not applicable to India in their entirety, in view of the explanation to section 7 (1); see notes on that section.)

In another case, in which also, a minister of the Established Church claimed that the annual value of his manse was not to be taken into account in calculating his total income for the purpose of his abatement but he could let the manse it was held that the annual value of the manse formed part of his income for such a purpose; and M'Dougall v. Sutherland was distinguished, Corke v. Fry, 3 Tax Cases 335; 32 Sc.L.R. 341.

In Lady Mellor v. Inland Revenue, 15 Tax Cases 25, Lord Warrington felt that Mc Dougall v. Southerland, had been wrongly decided and that while Corke v. Fry, was rightly decided it had been so decided on an irrelevant factor, viz., the ability to let. His view also rested on certain provisions peculiar to the United Kingdom Law. In Reed v. Cattermole, 21 Tax Cases 35, Lady Mellor's case was distinguished and it was held that the value of a rent-free house required to be occupied by the incumbent of an office, and maintained at the cost of the employer was not assessable on the employee as his income, i.e., Tennant v. Smith, was strictly followed.

(vii) any receipts, not being receipts arising from business or the exercise of a profession, vocation or occupation, which are of a casual and non-recurring nature, or are not by way of addition to the remuneration of an employee.

History.—Section 4 (3) (vii) was introduced at the instance of the Select Committee, in 1918, to remove doubts. There was no provision under the previous law, i.e., of 1886, except indirectly, in the definition of 'salary', and there are no rulings on the subject under that Act.

Casual.—According to Murray's New English Dictionary, "casual" means—

"subject to, depending on or produced by chance; accidental, fortuitous; occurring or coming at uncertain times; not to be calculated on, uncertain, unsettled, occurring or brought about without design or premeditation, coming up or presenting itself 'as it chances'."

In the United Kingdom law, the nearest corresponding words are "not annual"; as to the meaning of the word "annual", however, see Ryall v. Hoarc, 8 Tax Cases 521; (1923) 2 K.R. 447.

Non-recurring.—As to the meaning of the word "non-recurring", see decisions cited infra, and particularly In re Chunilal Kalyan Das, 1 I.T.C. 418; 47 All. 372; A.I.R. 1925 All. 265.

Capital receipts.—Under section 3, capital receipts are not taxable. Section 4 (3) (vii) therefore applies only to revenue receipts, such receipts being exempt only if they satisfy both the conditions laid down, viz., (a) they are casual and non-recurring; and (b) they do not arise from a business, etc.

Profession.—"A profession, in the present use of language, involves the idea of an occupation requiring purely intellectual skill or manual skill, controlled, as in painting and sculpture or surgery, by the intellectual skill of the operator, as distinguished from an occupation which is substantially the production or sale or arrangements for the production or sale of commodities. . . . It appears to me clear that a journalist whose contributions have any literary form, as distinguished from a reporter, exercises a 'profession'; and that the editor of a periodical comes in the same category. It seems to me equally clear that the proprietor of a newspaper or periodical, controlling the printing, publishing and advertising but not responsible for the selection of the literary or artistic contents, does not exercise a 'profession' but a trade or business. . . .", per L. J. Scrutton in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Maxse, (1919) 1 K.B. 647; 12 Tax Cases 41.

Only an individual can exercise a profession. See William Esplen. Son v. Inland Revenue, (1919) 2 K.B. 731; Inland Revenue v. Peter McIntyre, 12 Tax Cases 1006; individuals in partnership can no doubt exercise a profession.

Occupation.—"Occupation" means the Trade or calling by which a person seeks his livelihood, Luckin v. Hamlyn, 31 L.T. 366, or the business in which he is usually engaged to the knowledge of his neighbours (ibid.) and the statement of which would be sufficient to identify him to persons who have had dealings with him, Throssell v. Marsh, 53 L.T. 321. (The above with reference to the Bills of Sale Acts). Under the Libel and Registration Act, when applied to a person, it means his trade or following (Stroud). In interpreting restrictive covenants, it has been held that teaching or carrying on a school is a 'calling', notwithstanding that the calling may be under an illegal organisation, e.g., Society of Jesus, Galway v. Barden, (1899) 1 I.R. 514.

Vocation.—"I do not think 'employment' necessarily means a case in which a person is set to work by other men to earn money. A man may employ himself in order to earn money in such a way as to come within that definition, but I think the word 'vocation' is a still stronger word. It is admitted to be analogous to the word 'calling' which is a very large word; it means the way in which a man passes his life and it is a very large word indeed. . . . In my opinion, if a man were to make a systematic business of receiving stolen goods . . . the Income-tax Commissioners would be quite right in assessing him. . . . There is no limit as to its being a lawful vocation," per Denman, J., in Partridge v. Mallandaine, 2 Tax Cases 179; 18 Q.B.D. 276.

"'Vocation' and 'calling' are synonymous terms, and if anybody were asked what was the calling or vocation of these gentlemen, the answer would be 'professional book-makers'. . . .", per Hawkins, J., in Partridge v. Mallandaine, supra.

Note however that sections 7 and 10 of the Indian Act distinguish between "employment", on the one hand, and "profession" or "vocation", on the other. See also Davies v. Braithwaite, 18 Tax Cases 198; (1931) 2 K.B. 628, referred to under section 7.

Remuneration.—Is a wider term than salary (see Stroud). It means a 'quid pro quo' for service rendered. If a person was in receipt of a payment or a percentage or any kind of payment, which would not be an actual money payment, the amount he would receive annually in respect of this, would be 'remuneration', per Blackburn, J., in R. v. P. M. G., 1 Q.B.D. 663.

Law in the United Kingdom.—There is no specific exemption in the Acts in the United Kingdom, as in India, of casual incomes. Difficulty arises usually only in respect of Schedules D and E. Profits may be taxed broadly speaking, only if they (i) arise from a 'trade'—Schedule D, Case I; or (ii) are annual profits or gains from other sources—Schedule D, Case VI; or (iii) arise from a vocation, occupation, profession or employment—Schedule E or Schedule D, Case II.

"Trade" means, for this purpose, practically the same as, though a little narrower than, 'business' under the Indian law. Whether particular transactions constitute a 'trade' or not, has been held to be a question of fact. See rulings quoted under sections 2 (4), 'Business' and 3, 'Capital or Income'. In Graham v. Green, 9 Tax Cases 309, the General Commissioners held that the profits from backing horses, were in the circumstances of that case, liable to income-tax. Rowlatt, J., reversed the decision, and the Crown did not appeal. In Stubbs v. Cooper, 10 Tax Cases 29 (see below)—the Special Commissioners held that the profits from speculating in cotton futures, were not, in the circumstances of that case, liable to income-tax—whether under Case I or VI;—not liable under Case I, because there was not sufficient continuity in the business to constitute them into a 'trade'; nor under Case VI because they were pure gambling transactions, i.e., irregular, and not recurring at intervals. Rowlatt, J., reversed the finding, and held that the profits were from trade, (Case I) but the Court of Appeal (the M. of R. dissenting) reversed the decision of Rowlatt, J., on the ground that the question was one of pure fact. As regards the second part of the finding of the Commissioners, which involved a question of law the Court of Appeal held that the profits were taxable under Case VI as 'other annual profits', i.e., not from trade. (The M. of R. considered that a question of law was involved in the finding as to 'trade', and that Rowlatt, J., rightly reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners.)

Per Atkin, L.J.—

"There is no doubt that speculations in commodities of this kind are just like speculations in shares. . . . You have to look at the facts . . . this gentleman has been making his profits, not by investing his capital, because he never invested any money in this matter, but by making executory contracts which he closed by other executory contracts."

But where a cotton-broker enters into a speculative transaction in futures with a cotton dealer, the transactions are not purely wagering transactions, as they rest upon "real and enforceable contracts in which the differences could have been sued for, on one side or the other." Profits from such transactions are taxable; and iteration is not necessary under Case VI, Townsend v. Grundy, 18 Tax Cases 140; 12 A.T.C. 293. In this case the assessee was a manufacturer of agricultural implements who speculated in cotton futures. The brokers knew that the contracts were not to be fulfilled but the merchants for whom the brokers acted did not.

As to how far speculative transactions constitute 'trade', Atkin, L.J., said:

"For my part I see some difficulty in trying to form an opinion of a trade which consists of entering into transactions which would merely result in differences, and when the supposed trader never intends to get possession of any commodity so that he may in fact have the disposal of it by himself or to any third party."

The meaning of the word "annual" as used in the English Income-tax Act schedules with reference to "annual profits and gains", was discussed in great detail by Rowlatt, J., in Ryall v. Hoare, 8 Tax Cases 521; (1923) 2 K.B. 447, referred to later.

Rewards—Examination—Prizes, etc.—If the receipts recur, they are clearly taxable. Otherwise, it has to be examined whether the rewards or fees arise from a profession or occupation. If, for instance, the passing of an examination is obligatory, the income undoubtedly accrues by virtue of the assessee's office, and is therefore taxable as salary. If, on the other hand, the passing of the examination is optional, it may still be income arising from his profession, even if he receives it only ex gratia. If a person not holding the office would not be eligible for the reward, the reward would clearly arise out of the office.

Rewards for arresting or tracing offenders, would not be taxable, if paid to a person whose ordinary duty was not that of arresting or tracing offenders, but if paid to a man whose main duty was that, for example, to a Police Officer, or an Excise or Opium Officer or a Customs Officer, these rewards would undoubtedly be taxable, as they would arise from the office or profession. A prize given for an essay would not be taxable but not so the premia received by, say, an architect, who frequently tendered plans invited by public competition. Similarly, fees for setting or valuing examination papers, would clearly be taxable if such duties were part of the assessee's professional or other duties. Even if it was not part of his duties, a person who is an expert in a subject, and who is frequently called upon to examine in it, would still be taxable, but the tax would be not a part of 'salary', but 'income from other sources' or 'professional earnings' as the case may be. Examples of this would be a professor in a college setting papers for a University, or a lawyer setting papers in law. See Sir Hari Singh Gour's Case, 3 I.T.C. 350. Border-line cases are easily conceivable, for example, a Government servant, say, a policeman, setting a paper for a University in a subject like Mathematics or History, for a number of years in succession. In such a case, the presumption would be that he was an expert in that particular subject, and exercised the vocation of an examiner. Fees for giving expert evidence are clearly taxable, as they undoubtedly arise from the exercise of a profession. Similarly fees paid to a Government servant for doing work for local bodies, which are first credited to Government, and then paid to the officer, are clearly taxable as part of the salary, and so also honoraria paid by Government to its officers.

Rulings.—The following questions, viz., whether receipts are capital or income, whether transactions constitute a business, whether receipts are casual and non-recurring, and whether they arise out of a business, etc., are all often so closely connected with each other that the rulings referred to under this clause should be examined along with those under section 3 (capital and income), section 2 (4) (business) and section 7 (perquisites of office).

As regards income from unlawful transactions, see notes under section 3.

Gifts.—Even gifts would be taxable if recurring and regular and not casual and isolated, Kedar Narain Singh v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P., (1938) I.T.R. 157 (All.). As to gifts from an employer, see notes under section 7. A voluntary payment of gratuity made personally by the head of an associated company to the employees of a company that had gone into liquidation and was under no obligation to pay any gratuity to its employees was held to be exempt. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Johnstone, 1934 I.T.R. 390, 7 I.T.C. 330.

It has been held in the United Kingdom that a mere gift is not a profit or gain at all; the fact that it recurs will not make it a profit or gain. Accordingly, where a company voted recurring payments (which, after two instalments, were stopped) virtually amounting to pension to the ex-Managing-Director, who became an ordinary director and hardly attended any meeting because of ill-health, he having no claim to such payment even though the company had often made such payments to its employees the Revenue disallowed such payments in computing the income of the company and their action was not interfered with. The recipient was also considered not taxable on these gifts. Beynon v. Thorpe, 14 Tax Cases 1. This ruling, as also Stedeford v. Beloe, 1932 A.C. 388; 16 Tax Cases 505, were nullified by the United Kingdom Finance Act of 1932, under which voluntary payments made to employees and their dependants are deemed to be income taxable under schedule E, i.e., as salary of an officer.

Gifts, from employers to employees, whether in cash or in moneys worth, and debited to the profit and loss account of the employer, are taxable as salary irrespective of whether the payments are as of right or merely ex-gratia. Weston v. Hearn, (1943) 2 All.E.R. 421; 25 Tax Cases 425 (K.B.D.).

Betting—Book-maker—Profits of.—A person who attends races and systematically bets, is liable in respect of the profits he derives from the vocation of betting, i.e., that of a book-maker Partridge v. Mallandaine, 18 Q.B.D. 276. On the other hand, in the case of a person whose sole means of livelihood was betting on horses, from his private residence, with book-makers at starting prices, it was held that the earnings were neither profits nor gains, Graham v. Green, 9 Tax Cases 309; (1925) 2 K.B. 37. The ratio decidendi was that there must be a certain amount of organisation before there could be profits or gains.

Per Rowlatt, J.—“The question arises under Case VI whether the winnings on his bets, as bets, are profits or gains within the meaning of that case . . . and under Case II as to whether, assuming the winnings from the bets themselves are not profits or gains, the aggregate of his winnings as the result of his sustained and continued action, are the profits or gains of a vocation within the meaning of Case II, or possibly as it might have been put, of a trade or adventure within the meaning of the general words of Case I.

“My attention, of course, was drawn to my decision in Ryall v. Hoare, (1923) 2 K.B. 447; 8 Tax Cases 521, which was the case of a gentleman who had guaranteed an overdraft for a company of which he was a director; he got a commission for it, and it was the only time in his life he ever did anything of the sort. The question before me there, was not whether a commission paid to a man for a service of this kind, was a profit or gain in itself, which it obviously was, as a payment for commercial services rendered, but whether it was an annual profit or gain. In the course of my judgment, I said that a mere receipt by finding an object of value, or a mere gift, was not a profit or gain, and I hardly feel much doubt about that. I further said that the winning of a bet did not result in a profit or gain. Until I am corrected, I think, I was right in that. Whether it is a gift, or whether it is a finding, there is nothing of which there is a profit. There is no increment, there is no service, there is merely the picking up of something either by the will of the person who had it before, or because there is no person to oppose the picking up.

"When one comes to the question of a bet, it seems to me, the position is substantially the same. What is a bet? A bet is merely an irrational agreement that one person should pay another person something on the happening of an event. A agrees to pay B something if C's horse runs quicker than D's or if a coin comes one side up rather than the other side up. There is no relevance at all between the event and the acquisition of property. The event does not really produce it at all. It rests, as I say, on a mere irrational agreement.

"So much for Case VI. But then there is no doubt that if you set on foot an organised seeking after emoluments which are not in themselves profits, you may create, by way of a trade or an adventure or a vocation, a subject-matter which does bear fruit in the shape of profits or gains. Really a different conception arises, a conception of a trade or vocation which differs in its nature, in my judgment, from the individual acts which go to build it up, just as a bundle differs from odd sticks. You may say, I think, without perhaps an abuse of language, there is something organic about the whole, which does not exist in its separate parts.

"It is said that this gentleman, by continually betting with great shrewdness and good results, from his house or from any place where he could get access to the telegraph office, had set up a vocation. That is contended by the Revenue on the facts of this case and certainly the contention is one which, if sound, has very startling results: because a loss in a vocation or a trade or an adventure can be set off against other profits, and we are face to face with this result, that a gentleman earning a profit in some recognised form of industry, but having the bad habit of frequently, persistently, continuously and systematically betting with book makers might set off the losses by which he squandered the fruits of his industry, for Income-tax purposes, against his profits—a very remarkable result indeed, and one, I am afraid, of very wide application. Allowances are granted to the income-tax payer because of the family he has to support, and we are now threatened with a further allowance in respect of the loss which he makes by habitual betting. It certainly sounds very remarkable, and would entitle a person, when he wastes his earnings by betting, to make the State a partner in his gambling. However, the question must be faced.

"As I have said, there is no doubt that one might create a trade by making an organised effort to obtain emoluments which are not in themselves, taxable as profits, and the most familiar instance of all, of course, is a trade which has for its object the securing of capital increment. A person who buys an object which subsequently turns out to be worth more than he gave for it, and which he sells, does not thereby make a profit or gain for income-tax purposes. But he can organise himself to do that in a commercial and mercantile way, and the profits which emerge are taxable profits, not of the transaction, but of the trade. In the same way, he may carry on the trade of selling things which he has not got and buying them when the price has fallen. That is a capital accretion, only the operations are reversed. He sells first and buys afterwards. And in that way he may make losses, or he may make profits. If he makes losses, the losses cannot be said to be the results of the individual acts. They are the results of the trade as a whole. Test it in this way. A person may organise an effort to find things. He may start a salvage or exploring undertaking, and he may make profits. The profits are not the profits of the findings, they are the profits of the adventure as a whole. Again he may make a loss. One cannot say that the loss was due to the failure to find. The loss is due to the trade. That is a good test because it shows the difference between the trade as an organism, and the individual acts.

"So much is clear, I think, about the case of making a trade or a vocation of an adventure, of obtaining differences in prices or obtaining things which are the subject of finding. The trade or vocation which has to do with differences in prices may be popularly spoken of as gambling, because there is no intention really to accept or deliver the thing bought and sold. But they are operations in relation to the differences of prices of commodities, and there is an element of fecundity in those, and indeed, those operations form the subject-matter of a great deal of trade.

"Now we come to betting, pure and simple. (I do not mean to say that mercantile bargains are tainted with the element of gambling.) It has been settled that a bookmaker carries on a taxable vocation. What is the bookmaker's system? He knows that there are a great many people who are willing to back horses, and that they will back horses with anybody who holds himself out to give reasonable odds as a bookmaker. By calculating the odds in the case of various horses over a long period of time, and quoting them so that, on the whole, the aggregate odds, if I may use the expression, are in his favour, he makes a profit. That seems to me to be organising an effort in the same way that a person organises an effort if he sets out to buy himself things with a view to securing a profit by the difference in what I may call their capital value in individual cases.

"Now we come to the other side, the man who bets with the bookmaker, and that is this case. These are mere bets. Each time he puts on his money, at whatever may be the starting price. I do not think he could be said to organise his effort in the same way as a book-maker organises his. I do not think the subject-matter from his point of view is susceptible of it. In effect all he is doing is just what a man does who is a skilful player at cards, who plays every day. He plays to-day and he plays to-morrow and he plays the next day and he is skilful on each of the three days, more skilful on the whole than the people with whom he plays and he wins. But it does not seem that one can find, in that case, any conception arising in which his individual operations can be said to be merged in the way that particular operations are merged in the conception of a trade. I think all you can say of that man, in the fair use of English language, is that he is addicted to betting. It is extremely difficult to express, but it seems to me that people would say he is addicted to betting, and could not say that his vocation is betting. The subject is involved in great difficulty of language, which I think represents great difficulty of thought. There is no tax on a habit. I do not think 'habitual' or even 'systematic' fully describes what is essential in the phrase 'trade, adventure, employment or vocation.'

All I can say is that in my judgment the income which this gentleman succeeded in making is not profits or gains", Graham v. Green, 9 Tax Cases 309; (1925) 2 K.B. 37. See, however, observations in the Court of Appeal in Cooper v. Stubbs, (1925) 2 K.B. 753; 10 Tax Cases 29, suggesting that the above dicta of Rowlatt, J., are too wide, and leaving open the question whether continuous betting bringing an income receipt might not be 'profits or gains', and therefore taxable. The Allahabad High Court, in, In re Lala Indra Sen, 1940 I.T.R. 187, shared the doubts of the Court of Appeal. In the Allahabad case, two of the Judges considered that on the facts (which, as set out in the case were meagre) the racing and betting transactions of the assessee (a money-lender, and dealer in precious stones) were not 'business', though there was a difference of opinion as to whether the racing (i.e., the maintenance and running of horses) and the betting might be a single business or separate ones, while the third Judge, Iqbal Ahmad, considered that there was no evidence to hold that the transactions did not constitute business.

Per Braund, J.—I should, for myself, be very unwilling to try to lay down any general definition of what a 'business', 'profession', 'vocation' or 'occupation' is, because it is a matter which to my mind, must necessarily depend in every case on the circumstances of the assessee, the particular things he does, and the degree to which, and the object with which, he does them. A philatelist collects stamps for his own entertainment. A stamp dealer collects them for his profit. A country gentleman maintains a garden for his pleasure, while a market gardener or florist does so for his profit. And yet, in neither case, would it be right to say that either the desire for or an indifference to profit, as the case may be, was an exhaustive test, for business and pleasure may well be combined. And still less is it possible to my mind that an actual profit would necessarily convert what was primarily a hobby or a pastime into a business. For I do not doubt that many stamp and coin collectors entertain a secret hope that they may one day by good chance and to their profit acquire a rare and valuable specimen. And I think they would be surprised to know, if that were to happen, that they had been carrying on a 'business'. The truth I think is in this, as in so many other cases, that no exhaustive test can be applied but that all the surrounding circumstances must be considered and common sense applied. If there is one test which is, as I think, more valuable than another, it is to try to see what is the man's own dominant object—whether it was to conduct an enterprise of a commercial character or whether it was primarily to entertain himself.

A father and son who claimed to forecast accurately the results of horse races and contributed a 'betting system' in the shape of articles to newspapers claimed unsuccessfully that their remuneration for writing the articles was not taxable, Graham and others v. Arnott, 1941 K.B.D.

The mere fact that a person is persisting with an activity in spite of losses year after year will not make it a hobby, if otherwise the activity is a business or a source of income, e.g., the running of a dramatic troupe on commercial lines, P. S. Varier v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1940 I.T.R. 628.

Winning on bets on golf matches played by a golf professional do not arise out of his vocation as a professional, Down v. Compston, 16 A.T.C. 64; (1938) I.T.R. 596 (K.B.D.).

There are many rulings under the Australian law as to when profits from horse-racing and betting are taxable, the broad trend of the rulings being the same as in the United Kingdom, viz., that the profits are taxable if there is continuity and organisation, otherwise not.

Isolated transactions—Profits from.—A sum received by a businessman as brokerage on the sale of immovable property was held to be assessable to income-tax, although such a transaction was not apparently in the assessee's ordinary line of business and might or might not be repeated. In re Chunni Lal Kalyan Das, 47 All. 368.

"The particular transaction is certainly one of the business of a broker, and it comes within the definition of 'business'. It is not possible to exclude from the expression 'adventure', indeed, successful adventure, the negotiation of a sale of a large mill which resulted in a commission payable to the value of Rs. 75,000.

"In our view his transaction, although an isolated transaction, was not of a casual or non-recurring nature. To some extent the discussion of this question overlaps the question whether a particular receipt is a receipt arising from business or the exercise of a vocation. In taking the view we do, we found ourselves mainly upon the use of the word 'nature' in the exemption. The word is not 'occurrence'. If the language were 'a casual or non-recurring occurrence' there would be much to be said for the contention of the assessee. But the expression 'nature' appears to us to be a word used independently of the accident of the event happening in fact once only or more often in a fortunate year. It connotes a class of dealing which might occur only once, but which might occur several times. Now the adventure of a businessman who is enabled through his business association to negotiate a large transaction and thereby to earn a heavy commission, may undoubtedly be in fact non-recurring in the sense that so successful an adventure would not be likely to occur again. But, on the other hand, it is a class of transaction which might occur to any such businessman once only or half a dozen times again, during the course of the year. The Government Advocate put what may be said to be a decisive illustration of the true meaning of the word 'nature' when he pointed out that if you sold your own house at a profit, although the question would also arise as to whether the result of that transaction was a profit at all but rather only enhanced capital it would in any discussion as to whether it was brought within this exemption undoubtedly be a transaction of a non-recurring nature. You could not do it twice. But if, on the other hand, you engaged in a solitary transaction of bringing two of your friends together, and negotiated the sale of the house of one of them to the other, and thereby earned a commission, you would, in our opinion, be carrying out a transaction which although casual in fact, would not be of a non-recurring nature, because, having done so once with success, you might be asked by some vendor to do it again. Our answer therefore . . . is that the particular profit in question was not of a casual and non-recurring nature within the meaning of the section", In re Chunni Lal Kalyan Das, 1 I.T.C. 419; 47 All. 368, 370-371; A.I.R. 1925 All.* 469.

A banker and money-lender, remitted from Madras sums aggregating over 4 lakhs of rupees to Penang, such sums being invested there in Straits Settlements dollars, and ultimately reconverted into rupees and remitted back to Madras. The remittances were made on eight occasions within a period of four months in 1919 and the retransfer to Madras was on thirteen occasions covering a period of four months from the end of 1920 to the beginning of 1921. Owing to the fluctuations in exchange which varied between 83 and 175 rupees per hundred dollars, he made a profit of a considerable amount on the transaction, and was assessed to income-tax on that profit.

Per Sir Walter Schwabe, C.J. (Coutts-Trotter, J., concurring).—
 “Transactions need not be part of some already established business but they must together form a business. If the transactions form part of the ordinary business of the assessee the profits or losses on them must, of course, be brought into account. But where the transactions are outside the scope of the ordinary business of the assessee it is often a difficult question to decide whether or not they are to be treated as subject to income-tax. Profits made on an isolated speculation are not liable to income-tax but those made in speculation of a similar kind as a part of business would be liable. A difficult question may, however, arise as to whether transactions are of such frequency as to amount to carrying on a business.

The right inference to be drawn from the facts is that in this case those dealings in exchange had become part of the assessee's banking business, and I think too, that even looked at apart from his ordinary business, he did not enter into these transactions as an isolated investment of capital or speculation, but as a business of a dealer in exchange.”
Board of Revenue v. Arunachalam Chettiar, 1 I.T.C. 238; 47 Mad. 197.

Whether a purchase of shares has been made as an investment of capital or with a view to resell at a profit is a question of intention and can only be inferred from the circumstances of each case. The question therefore is one of fact on which the findings of the Commissioner will be final so long as there is evidence for them, In re Seth Ganga Sagar, 1934 I.T.R. 149; A.I.R. 1934 All. 370.

An assessee consented to be appointed under a power-of-attorney to dispose of cotton bales for and on behalf of a firm that had got into difficulties to pay what was due to several Muccadams and Banks, and after deducting from the net sale proceeds of the cotton bales all his costs, charges and expenses in respect thereof and his remuneration, to distribute the balance amongst the several persons and firms whose names had already been submitted by the firm to the assessee. Under that power-of-attorney the assessee sold over 100,000 bales which realized about Rs. 1,63,00,000 and received as his remuneration Rs. 1,88,750. The assessee claimed exemption for this sum under section 4 (3) (vii) of the Income-tax Act.

Per Macleod, C.J.—“ It has been argued that ‘business’ connotes continuity, and that only the receipts arising from a business which is carried on continuously can be assessed. But the section refers to receipts arising from ‘business’ and not to receipts arising from ‘a business’. It is not necessary according to the definition of ‘business’ in section 2 (4) that the receipts should arise from a business continuously carried on during the year to make them liable to assessment. Even if they arose from a single adventure in business they would be liable to be taxed.

“Now it seems clear that the profession or occupation of the assessee being that of a cotton merchant, any receipts arising from the buying and selling of cotton would be considered as arising from trade or commerce, and the argument that receipts from an extraordinary transaction connected with business, such as the one in this case which has only occurred owing to exceptional circumstances, and which would not be likely to occur again for many years, can be placed in the same category as receipts entirely disconnected with business or the profession or vocation or occupation of the assessee which might be considered of a casual and non-recurring nature, cannot be accepted", Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas, 2 I.T.C. 8; A.I.R. 1925 Bom. 318.

Where, however, a hide merchant acted as arbitrator in a dispute between the heirs of a rich friend and the Court granted him remuneration as arbitrator though nothing had been stipulated in the first instance, it was held that the receipt was casual and non-recurring and not arising from a profession, etc., and therefore not taxable, Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. Ahmad Badsha, 1943 I.T.R. 590.

A money-lender took over a rubber estate and certain debts in settlement of an outstanding loan. As monies were realised the loss in recovering the debts was allowed as a business deduction. The expenses on the estate and its income were also included in the business account. When the estate was sold, there was a gain and it was claimed that it was a capital appreciation. Held, that the profit from the sale was part of the profits of the money-lending business, O. R. M. O. M. S. P. Lakshmanan Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 200. It cannot however be assumed without evidence relating to each case that merely because the prevalent practice among similarly circumstanced persons is to buy and sell property as part of the business, the assessee's transactions in property are part of his money-lending or other business, R. M. V. R. M. Veerappa Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 4 I.T.C. 204; A.I.R. 1930 Mad. 123.

Where the assessee a money-lender, received from his father a going money lending business and certain plantations and treated the plantations as part of the capital of the money-lending business, debiting the business with the cost of maintaining the plantations and taking credit for the income therefrom, and finally sold the plantations and credited the proceeds to the business, it was held that the profit on the sale was a part of the profit of the money-lending business, K. Ar. S. T. Arunachalam Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1946 I.T.R. 61.

For a small consideration in cash a money-lender got an assignment of a mortgage on certain house property carrying certain other encumbrances. Eventually in a circuitous manner and after litigation, he took over the houses and sold them after enjoying the rents for some time. Held, that though the original transaction was speculative and isolated it was not essentially different from the assessee's other business transactions and that the profit was not a capital appreciation and therefore not exempt from tax, S. R. M. S. Subramania Chettiar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1934 I.T.R. 295. A mining engineer prospecting for minerals and taking out licences but with no capital of his own to work the mines and selling the rights therefor to others was taxed on the profits made on the portions sold. Held, that the question whether the transactions amounted to a business was one of fact, Warwick Smith v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 5 I.T.C. 451. On the other hand where in return for a loan given to a mining engineer, the lender received the sale proceeds of certain mining rights held by the borrower, it was held that the gains of the lender was not taxable, since it was not his business to finance such mines.

Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma v. Milne; 1934 I.T.R. 25; 11 Rang. 454.

The real question in all such cases is whether there was gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme of profit making; and it is not necessary that there should have been a primary intention, at the time of acquiring any assets, to enter on an adventure in the course of trade or that there should be a series of transactions. The question is essentially one of fact, Jubb v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 1938 I.T.R. 210.

Three individuals—members of firms in the wine trade—formed themselves into a syndicate by oral agreement and purchased as a speculation—and apart from their firms—a large quantity of brandy from the Cape Government in a single transaction. The bulk of the brandy was shipped to England, where it was sold, after blending, by the firms to which the three individuals belonged, acting on behalf of the syndicate. Held, that there was evidence on which the Commissioners could find that there was a trade.

“ . . . These gentlemen did far more than simply buy an article which they thought was going cheap, and re-sell it. They bought it with a view to transport it, with a view to modify its character by skilful manipulation, by blending, with a view to alter, not only the amounts by which it could be sold as a man might split up an estate, but by altering the character in the way it was done up so that it could be sold in smaller quantities. They employed experts—and were experts themselves—to dispose of it over a long period of time. When I say over a long period of time I mean by sales which began at once but which extended over some period of time. They did not buy it and put it away, they never intended to buy it and put it away and keep it. They bought it to turn over at once obviously, and to turn over advantageously by means of the operations which I have indicated. Now under those circumstances the Commissioners have held that they did carry on a trade, and I think it is a question of fact, and I do not think, by telling me all the evidence, that the Commissioners can make me, or indeed give me authority—because they cannot give me authority if I do not possess it by law—to determine the question of fact. . . .”, per Rowlatt, J., in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1921) 1 K.B. 64, upheld by Court of Appeal in (1921) 2 K.B. 403 (C.A.); 12 Tax Cases 358.

Where a person with no knowledge of the whisky trade bought spirit in bond in three lots, blended and sold it over four months through agents, it was held that he carried on a trade. Per Lord Normand.—“The purchase of a large quantity of a commodity like whisky greatly in excess of what could be used by himself, his family and friends, a commodity which yields no pride of possession, which cannot be turned to account except by a process of realisation, can scarcely be considered to be other than an adventure in a transaction in the nature of trade.” Inland Revenue v. Fraser. 3 Taxation Reports 225, 24 Tax Cases 498.

A wholesale agricultural machinery merchant who had never dealt in linen, bought the war surplus stock of aeroplane linen as a single transaction and made large profits in selling it. It was contended on his behalf that it was an isolated transaction not constituting a ‘trade’. Held, that it was ‘trade’, Martin v. Lowry (infra).

Per Rowlatt, J.—“Now he only made one purchase but that. . . . does not prevent the subject-matter being a trade (then refers to the California Copper Case, 5 Tax Cases 159; the Cape Brandy Syndicate Case, (1921) 2 K.B. 403 C.A. and Beynon v. Ogg, 7 Tax Cases 125).

 He bought this gigantic consignment of linen and he set to work to make people come in and buy it; to induce them. he set to work and worked away at it, and got offices, did this, that and the other and they bought it all and all this is profit. Why is not that a 'trade'?"

Per Pollock, M. R.—"The Appellant's contention was that he had one speculation in the nature of a gambling transaction, and had not carried on a trade or business, for his own calling was that of a merchant engaged in the business of wholesale machinery . . . a business which had no part in, or affinity to, the trade in linen. We agree with the Commissioners and Mr. Justice Rowlatt that this contention is untenable. The appellant entered upon this separate new trade or business or adventure for the purpose of realising profits or gains in it, and even if his purchase was made under a single contract, the realisation of his profits which were large, was accomplished by his setting up a trading organization. If it was maintained only till the 45,000,000 yards was disposed of, it was none the less characterised as a business while it was in being. Whatever view may be taken by the Courts upon such a point, it is a question of fact which it is for the Commissioners to determine. They had abundant material upon which to reach the conclusion that they did. . . . It is not possible to lay down definite lines to mark out what is a business or a trade or adventure and to define the distinctive characteristics of each; nor is it necessary, or wise to do so. The facts in each case may be very different, but it is the facts that establish the nature of the enterprise embarked upon", Martin v. Lowry, (1926) 1 K.B. 550, 554 (C.A.); 11 Tax Cases 297.

It was also argued on behalf of the assessee in the above case that the profits were not "annual", but the Court of Appeal confirmed the interpretation of that word as given by Rowlatt, J., in Ryall v. Hoare, 8 Tax Cases 521. Subject to certain reservations as regards the meaning of the word "annual", the House of Lords confirmed the judgments of the Lower Courts in (1927) A.C. 312 (H.L.); 11 Tax Cases 297.

The fact that a transaction is unusual or that separate (though unpublished) accounts are kept will not in themselves make a transaction outside the business of a company if such transaction is otherwise part of its business, i.e., within the objects of the memorandum. Hesketh Estates v. Craddock, 1943 K.B.D. (?) See also Dalmia Cement Co's. Case, 1944 I.T.R. 50 (Pat.).

A ship-repairer, a blacksmith and a fish merchant's employee, with no previous business association with each other, jointly bought a cargo steamer with a view to its alteration and sale. They altered it into a steam drifter and sold it at a profit. Held, that the purchase and sale was "an adventure in the nature of trade" and not a casual transaction.

Per Lord Sands.—"Having a picture cleaned, or a ship's boilers cleaned and the hull repainted is not 'trade' but purchasing a quantity of pig iron and having it manufactured into steel or of gold-bearing ore and having the gold extracted by melting the ore is 'trade'."

Per L. P. Clyde.—"If the venture was one consisting simply in one isolated purchase of some article against an expected rise in price and a subsequent sale, it might be impossible to say that the venture was 'in the nature of trade' . . . the test is whether the operations . . . are of the same kind, and carried on in the same way, as those which are characteristic of ordinary trading in the line of business in which the venture was made", Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Livingston, Florence and Keith, 11 Tax Cases 538; (1927) Sess. Cas. 251.

The last three cases were reviewed in Leeming v. Jones, 15 Tax Cases 333, by Rowlatt, J., who showed that the test suggested by the Lord President in the Livingston Case was the real test which covered all these three different types of cases, viz., where an important and large asset is bought and sub-divided and so made more marketable, and the sub-division is advertised and so on (Martin v. Lowry): where you get a thing altered and treated and dealt with in an expert way and also sub-divided (Cape Brandy Syndicate Case); where you get a thing, though not altered or sub-divided, yet so thoroughly repaired that it is converted into a new and better article (Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Livingston). In all these cases the isolated transactions constituted trade because the "operations . . . are of the same kind . . . as those which are characteristic of ordinary trading in the line of business in which the venture was made". (Per Lord President Clyde in the Livingston Case.)

In Leeming v. Jones, which went up to the House of Lords the assessee was one of a syndicate of four persons who obtained options over two rubber estates and sold them to a public company. He was not a company promoter nor was his business that of buying and selling estates. Per Lord Buckmaster, "the transaction in this case stands alone and isolated: it is, to my mind, purely an affair of capital. I can see no difference between it and what might have happened, had the respondent bought shares in two companies which were going to be amalgamated, and then sold equivalent shares in the amalgamated company at a profit; an accretion to capital does not become income merely because the original capital was invested in the hope and expectation that it would rise in value. If it does so rise, its realisation does not make it income."

The point is that so long as no trade is carried on, the profits made are not taxable, and it makes no difference that the object of the isolated transaction is re-sale and profit on such re-sale.

"A single plunge may be enough, provided it is shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the plunge is made in the waters of trade; but the sale of a piece of property—if that is all that is involved in the plunge—may easily fall short of anything in the nature of trade. Transactions of sale are characteristic of trade but they are not necessarily distinctive of it."—Per L. P. Clyde in Balgorowie Land Trust, Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Tax Cases 684.

"If it is desired to tax the difference between what a man has bought goods for or property for and sold them for, you can tax it only . . . if you can say that what he did was a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade"—Per Rowlatt, J., in Pearn v. Miller, 11 Tax Cases 610.

A firm of stone, marble and granite merchants in England, made a contract with a firm for the supply to them of marble, and contemplated acquiring some of this marble in Italy. In order to facilitate their purchase of this marble later on, they bought Italian lire at once. The lire rose in value, and the firm brought the money back in sterling; and the lire fell in value and the firm converted the money again into lire. Held, that the profits on the lire were not taxable.

"I do not think it has anything to do with the profit of the contract itself (that of the supply of marble). It was . . . a mere appreciation of something which they had got in hand."—Per Rowlatt, J., in McKinlay v. Jenkins & Sons, Ltd., 5 A.T.C. 317; 10 Tax Cases 372.

In this case it was found as a fact by the Commissioners that it was no part of the company's business to speculate in the exchanges. The money was lying idle in the bank.

On the other hand, if the transactions from which the profits arise are part and parcel of the trading operations of the assessee, the fact that the cause of the profit is abnormal, e.g., England's going off the gold standard, is no reason to hold that the profits do not arise from the trade, Landes Bros. v. Simpson, 13 A.T.C. 489 (K.B.D.); 19 Tax Cases 62.

Similarly, where a shipowner (not a coal merchant), who had contracts for the supply of coal to him in excess of his needs transferred the contracts at a profit, it was held that the profit was trading profit, the coal being consumable stores on revenue account, essential for the purpose of the assessee's trade. The claim of the assessee was that the profit represented appreciation of capital (on the analogy of John Smith v. Moore, 12 Tax Cases 266) or a casual profit since the assessee was not a coal merchant and coal was not his trading stock, George Thompson & Co. v. Inland Revenue, 12 Tax Cases 1091.

In Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Kelly (C.A.) 1943, 25 Tax Cases 292, the company used to accumulate dollars in America throughout the year so as to be in a position to purchase virginia leaf at auction sales. It had a large accumulation of dollars when war broke out. The Treasury asked it to stop buying leaf and took over the dollars at a price which left a profit to the company. It was held that the profit was taxable. The company merely sold a surplus stock of dollars that it had on revenue account, like any commodity, and it was immaterial that the sale was forced and not voluntary.

An assessee who was a money-lender and had been connected with the film business and also been a dealer in real property, purchased, while on a visit to Germany, a large quantity of toilet paper at cheap rates from a bankrupt German firm, and sold the whole to one person and made a heavy profit. Held, that it was trade. "The appellant was himself liable for the purchase of this vast quantity of toilet paper, for no individual or personal purpose of his own but plainly and manifestly . . . (for the purpose of) re-selling it at a profit. . . . The element of adventure accordingly entered into it from the first."—Per L. P. Clyde, Rutledge and Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 8 A.T.C. 207; 14 Tax Cases 490; (1929) Sess. Cas. 379.

A company whose business embraced prospecting for and acquiring options over mineral properties all over the world and purchasing and re-selling such properties to development companies invited outsider (not shareholders) to participate in individual ventures by subscribing towards the cost of prospecting and acquiring the options over particular properties. If the prospecting was satisfactory, the options were exercised and development companies formed in which the subscribers, viz., the parent company and the outsiders had to—and did—take shares. On the other hand, the parent company was under no obligation to form a development company, e.g., it could sell the rights and hand over cash to the subscribers. The outside subscribers took no part in the management beyond being consulted as to any increase in the initial commitments. The parent company was taxed on the value of shares held by it in the development companies and the money invested by itself in the various ventures, since the ventures constituted its trade. But the outsider subscribers were not similarly taxed since the ventures were not part of their trade and their profits were therefore capital accretion, Lovry v. Field; Lovry v. Williams, etc., 20 Tax Cases 679. See also Pickford v. Quirke, 6 A.T.C. 525; 13 Tax Cases 251 (C.A.), referred to under section 2 (4).

Two individuals, who had been for some years buying, selling and developing building lands bought certain undeveloped lands in equal shares and almost immediately each of them gave his share of the land to his wife. And soon after, each of the ladies sold her share to a company in which the husbands were the only directors and in which each of the latter held half the shares. Two years afterwards a similar transaction occurred. The question arose whether the ladies carried on a trade in respect of these two transactions and the Special Commissioners decided in the negative. The High Court declined to interfere on the ground that the Commissioners had evidence to support their decision, Williams v Davies & Nisbet, (1945) 1 All.E.R. 304.

An assessee, instead of purchasing an annuity laid out a large sum of money in buying 63 endowment insurance policies and a life policy on the lives of other people, so arranged that he could get regular receipts every year from these policies as they fell due for payment. At a later stage, owing to a change in his circumstance, viz., receiving a physical injury in war service and having to change his residence permanently, he asked his solicitors to gift away some of the policies and sell the others. The question arose whether the profit from the sale of policies was taxable, and the Special Commissioners decided that in view of the number of transactions and the organised manner of purchases and sales, there was a trade and that the profits were therefore taxable. Macnaghten, J., reversed this decision on the ground that buying something with the intention of keeping it cannot be trade, and that a subsequent intention to sell it cannot by itself make the transaction 'trade', Smith Barry v. Cordy, (1945) 1 All.E.R. 695.

Where an assessee whose business activities were confined to money-lending, owning land and to an interest in certain mills bought on speculation an interest in certain legacies and after protracted litigation recovered a substantial sum, it was held that the transaction was not an adventure in the nature of trade, Mothay Gangaraju v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, 1935 I.T.R. 58; A.I.R. 1935 Mad. 387; 58 Mad. 363.

Where an assessee agreed to advance money to another for the purpose of litigation on condition that if the case was won the borrower was to pay a bonus to the lender and that if the case was lost the lender was to lose the money, and eventually received a bonus, it was held that the bonus arose from business, i.e., the business of investing money in financing litigation. The speculativeness of the transaction or the absence of a specific rate of interest did not in themselves make the transaction any the less an investment of money, In re Gaya Prasad and Chotey Lal, 8 I.T.C. 64; A.I.R. 1935 All. 495; 1935 I.T.R. 177 (All.). A Full Bench of the same Court, however, dissented from this ruling later on, In re Major John, 1938 I.T.R. 434 (All.). In that case, the assessee who held the greater part of the debentures of a company obtained a decree against the company, the assets of which were auctioned in the execution of the decree. The assessee was allowed by the Court to act as auctioneer and received on that account 5 per cent. of the sale proceeds as commission under the orders of the Court. The question arose whether this 5 per cent. was capital or income, and the Court held, following the observations of the Privy Council in Shaw Wallace Company's case, 59 Cal. 1343; 59 I.A. 206, that it was capital.

Where an assessee, not a stock broker or a company promoter, but an employee of a sugar factory sold a large number of shares in a company floated by his employer to take over the factory and the Directors in recognition of the assessee's work allotted some shares to him of their own accord and without any previous arrangement, it was held that the value of the shares was a windfall and not income. It also did not arise from business since there was no activity having for its object the acquirement of profit which could be claimed legally, In re Mahammad Faruq, 1938 I.T.R. 1 (All.)

A mere adventure, however, will not attract tax unless it is in the nature of trade. A purchase therefore, on speculation, even if made with a view to sale, does not lead to taxable profit, unless the transaction is in the nature of trade. What constitutes trade is a question of fact. Where the wife of a partner in a money-lending firm which also dealt in bullion (she having a money-lending business through the agency of the firm but not a bullion business) bought a quantity of silver on speculation with a view to sale and sold it at a profit, through her husband's firm, there being no other activity on her part in respect of the transaction, it was held that there were no materials for a finding that the transaction was in the nature of trade. The fact that the husband's firm dealt in bullion or that other persons were also speculating in silver at that time was considered irrelevant, Mrs. Soniram Poddar v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Burma, 1939 I.T.R. 470. The above decision was dissented from by the Lahore High Court in In re Beharilal Jhandumal, 1944 I.T.R. 209. In that case, a Hindu undivided family with a money-lending business brought a large quantity of gold when England went off the gold standard and paid for it by borrowing or prematurely withdrawing fixed deposits from banks. After five years, it sold off one-fourth of the gold at a profit, and it was held that the profit was taxable there being evidence for a finding that the adventure was in the nature of trade.

The governing factor in deciding whether isolated transactions are ventures in the nature of trade is the intention of the assessee at the time of purchase, but his subsequent conduct may have a material bearing on the question of his original motive. Kahanchand and Kishenchand v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Punjab, 1944 I.T.R. 472.

An assessee purchased an inam village near a city, with borrowed money and laid out a part of this area for development as a middle class suburb, spending money in the process. He sold a substantial number of plots, but not all of them, in two consecutive years, and it was held that there was evidence for a finding that the transactions constituted a business. In re Mody, 1940 I.T.R. 179 (Bom.).

An architect was told on a social occasion by the owner of an estate that he wanted to sell it; and the former brought about a meeting between a client of his and the owner. The estate was bought by the client on behalf of his company, and subsequently it was agreed between the architect and his client's company that in return for his attempts to dispose of the estate, he was to get $\frac{1}{4}$ of the net profits. The estate was sold soon and the architect received his share of the profits. He did not however do any work beyond preparing a plan which was not used. It was held that his share of the profits was taxable, Brocklesby v Merricks, 18 Tax Cases 576 (C.A.).

Grants to Clergymen.—A gift of money, raised by voluntary subscription, and made annually to a minister of religion by his congregation, was held to be assessable.

Per the Lord Ordinary.—"It is true that it is a voluntary contribution by the parishioners, one which they are under no obligation to make, and which they may withdraw at any time. But still it is a payment made to the appellant, as their clergyman, and it is received by the appellant in respect of the discharge of his duties of that office". In re the Rev George Walter Strong, 1 Tax Cases 207, 15 Sc L.R. 704.

In a case in which the Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund made grants to a Clergyman in augmentation of the income of his benefice, it was held that the grants were assessable on the Clergyman as profits accruing to him by reason of his office. In this case the Court considered the precise form of the application for the grant and of the resolution authorizing the grant. The decision was given in favour of the Crown on the ground that (1) no enquiry was made as to the personal means of the incumbent but only as to the income of the benefice, it being left to the incumbent to ask for the grant if he needed it and (2) if the benefice was vacant, the grant was divided between the outgoing and incoming incumbents. It followed therefore that the income accrued by reason of the office. Turner v. Cuxson, 2 Tax Cases 422, was distinguished on the ground that the grant in that case was as a personal gift of an eleemosynary character; and the principle underlying the decision in In re Strong, supra, was approved.

Per Collins, M.R.—"Now that judgment (the Strong case . . .) is certainly an affirmation of a principle of law that a payment may be liable to income-tax although it is voluntary on the part of the persons who made it, and that the test is whether, from the standpoint of the person who receives it, it accrues to him in virtue of his office. . . . That seems to me to be the test; and . . . the liability to income-tax is not negatived merely by reason of the fact that there was no legal obligation on the part of the persons who contributed the money to pay it", Rev. G. N. Herbert v. J. A. McQuade, 4 Tax Cases 489; (1902) 2 K.B. 631.

A curate received from a religious society a grant renewable annually at discretion on certain conditions. The grant was in recognition of faithful service as a clergyman, but not in respect of the particular curacy the clergyman held. Held, that it was not assessable to income-tax, In re Strong, 1 Tax Cases 207, distinguished.

Per Coleridge, C.J.—"Now here the payment is made, not for services in the parish at all, not by the persons whom he serves and not in respect of the particular services which he renders—but it is an honorarium paid by a society . . . to a deserving man because he has done his duty well", Turner v. Cuxson, 2 Tax Cases 422; 22 Q.B.D. 150.

A gratuitous payment, with no conditions attached, made to the Lord Bishop of Lucknow as such, i.e., ex officio by the Colonial Bishopric Fund was held to be a perquisite of his office, Saunders (Dr.) v. Commissioner of Income-tax, U.P. (Oudh), 5 I.T.C. 454; 54 All. 223.

In a case in which the grants were to cease on the Minister's death or his resignation of the pulpit, i.e., the grant was given on quasi-personal grounds, it was nevertheless held that the grants were assessable to Income-tax, having regard to the facts of the case, viz., (a) the ability of the congregation to make adequate provision for their minister, (b) the fact that the minister had been regularly educated for the vocation, (c) the amount of his income, Poynting v. Faulkner, 5 Tax Cases 145 (C. of A.); 21 T.L.R. 428.

A portion of a collection made in Church was given by way of 'Easter offerings' to an incumbent by reason of his office; but the gift would not have been made had not the recipient, besides being the incumbent, been also poor. Held, that the offerings were not given as an additional remuneration for services, but on account of personal poverty, and that, in these circumstances, they were not assessable to income-tax, Turton v. Cooper, 5 Tax Cases 138; 21 T.L.R. 546.

The correctness of this decision was however doubted in Cooper v. Blakiston, 5 Tax Cases 347, infra.

Easter Offerings were given to a Vicar by parishioners and others in response to an appeal made by the Bishop and supported by the Churchwardens. The offerings were mainly received through collections in Church, the residue consisting of sums sent to the Churchwardens or directly to the Vicar. Held, by the House of Lords that the offerings were assessable to income-tax.

Per Buckley, L.J.—"The question is not what was the motive of the payment, but what was the character in which the recipient received it. Was it received by him by reason of his office?"

Per the Lord Chancellor.—"In my opinion, where a sum of money is given to an incumbent substantially in respect of his services as incumbent, it accrues to him by reason of his office. Here the sum of money was given in respect of those services. Had it been a gift of an exceptional kind, such as a testimonial, or a contribution for a specific purpose, as to provide for a holiday, or a subscription peculiarly due to the personal qualities of the particular clergyman, it might not have been a voluntary payment for services but a mere present.

"In this case, however, there was a continuity of annual payments apart from any special occasion or purpose, and the ground of the call for subscription was one common to all clergymen with insufficient stipends, urged by the Bishop on behalf of all alike. What you choose to call it matters little. The point is, what was it in reality?"

"It was natural, and in no way wrong, that all concerned should make this gift appear as like a mere present as they could. But they acted straightforwardly, as one would expect, and the real character of what was done appears clearly enough from the papers in which contributions were solicited", Cooper v. Blakiston, 5 Tax Cases 347; (1909) A.C. 104.

The proceeds of voluntary collections from a congregation at Whitsuntide for the benefit of an assistant stipendiary curate have been held to be taxable as part of the emoluments of office, Slaney v. Starkey, 16 Tax Cases 45; (1931) 2 K.P. 148. In all these cases, if these grants had been made (say) on the retirement of the clergyman or his golden wedding, the amounts would not have been taxable. See the Lord Chancellor's observations in Cooper v. Blakiston, above.

Income from profession.—For income to arise from a profession or employment, it is not necessary that the income should be paid only by the person or persons engaging the services. Where a solicitor who represented his client (from whom he received fees) in a meeting of shareholders and got some proposals through was given gratuitously Rs. 10,000 by persons—not his clients—because they benefited by his action in the meeting, it was held that the Rs. 10,000 arose from his profession, In re Susil Sen, 1941 I.T.R. 261 (Cal.).
